The SPEAKER. It is only the rules that stand in the way of the consideration of the bill that are suspended; and so far as the Chair recollects, it has been the practice to read the bills at some time. Every man in the House has a right to have the bill read once at least on which he is called to vote. It seems to the Chair that the practice of the House had better be adhered to.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If my memory serves me correctly, I think it has been frequently ruled, under a suspension, that the reading is unnecessary. But I am not controverting the Chair in that, and if the rule calls for the reading of the bill, I should like to ask unanimous consent, as the House is paying very little attention to the reading——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there are one or more precedents where the House has suspended the rules and dispensed with the reading of a measure, but there would have to be a special vote on that method of proceeding. It is a little inconvenient, but it seems to the Chair——

Mr. MANN. I should think the gentleman might contain his patience long enough, in his desire to get statehood, so that the bill might at least be read.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois is paying particular attention to the reading.

Mr. MANN. On the contrary, the gentleman has been examining the bill very carefully.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object, if it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LLOYD. I demand a second.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to occupy so much even as five minutes. I simply want to say that I believe I express the conviction of the overwhelming majority of this House when I say that the question whether we shall make States out of Arizona and New Mexico is practically a foreclosed question. The platforms of both the great political parties have declared for immediate separate statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. The retiring administration has repeatedly declared for statehood for those Territories, and I am informed that the incoming administration desires the admission of these Territories as States.

I have read in the newspapers that it has been said by some one, not connected with this House, but connected with Congress, that there may not be sufficient time during the remainder of this session for the consideration of this bill. I have only to say that during the last six years no question has received more frequent consideration by the Committee on the Territories of this House and the Committee on Territories of the Senate, and by the House and by the Senate than this question of statehood; and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when we should grant statehood to these Territories. [Applause.]

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. LLOYD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. [Prolonged applause.]

[Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan occasion, but in response to something more than a suggestion in the remarks of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I desire to call attention to the fact that ever since 1875 there has scarcely been a Congress when statehood bills for Arizona and New Mexico have not been introduced; that during the Cleveland administration, in the Fifty-second Congress, the Democratic party had full control of the House and in the Fifty-third Congress had full control of Congress, but no statehood bills were passed. [Applause on the Republican side.] As I said before, this is not a partisan occasion——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I hope my friend from Michigan has not understood me as trying to throw any partisan color into this matter.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I feared the gentleman might be doing that.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It was far from my purpose to do so, I will say to my friend from Michigan, and, speaking for my people, we can not say too much for the honest and consistent labors which he has given to our cause.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I thank the gentleman, and I am completely disarmed. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think it entirely fitting that in speaking of these Territories we should speak of the gentlemen who have represented them. My love for Arizona has been increased by my admiration for her good judgment in sending MARK SMITH to Congress. [Applause.]

No Member of the Sixtieth Congress will retire from it more universally beloved or more universally regretted than my dear old friend the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. [Applause.]

I might be tempted to question the appreciation and the wisdom of Arizona in permitting him to return to private life were I not aware of his sensitive and intense devotion to his people and his unwillingness to hear them questioned or criticised, even though in that criticism there should be implied a compliment to himself.

I can say, however, that his retirement at this time is the cause of genuine surprise among those who have followed his career with interest and with admiration. But a short time ago it seemed morally certain that Arizona and New Mexico would be indissolubly bound in a union that to the people of Arizona appeared nothing less than a loathsome and abhorred miscegenation. Then it was that MARK SMITH displayed his tireless devotion to his people and his marvelous tact and resourcefulness in saving them from the impending catastrophe. [Applause.]

A Delegate without a vote, with nothing to give and nothing to exchange, battling among several hundred cool, calculating politicians, undaunted by the desperation of his cause, determined to fight as long as there was a ray of hope, and die, if need be, in the last ditch. In the committee rooms, in the House, in the Senate—he was everywhere, he saw everybody. Nothing could be done or said or attempted that he was not there to answer, to explain, to checkmate. Twenty-odd years of distinguished service had won for him the respect of the House and of the Senate, and his generous, genial, and winsome personality had attracted to him every man capable of a generous impulse or disinterested emotion. In the presence of those who knew him in that trying hour, I can unhesitatingly say, without being charged with exaggeration or flattery, that it was to the efforts of MARK SMITH and to his personal influence more than to any and to all other causes combined that Arizona owes her escape from the irksome shackles which she so much dreaded. [Applause.]

Had any Member of the House of Representatives, on either side of the Chamber, been asked "What would be the inevitable result, so far as MARK SMITH was personally concerned," the reply would inevitably have been: "MARK SMITH will remain in the House as long as Arizona is a Territory, and he will be the first to wear with distinction the senatorial toga when she becomes a State." [Prolonged applause.] It was indeed with pain and amazement we learned that after more than twenty years of distinguished service this tried and valiant champion of his people, with his deathless laurels still fresh upon his brow, was retired by the Territory he had redeemed, and that Arizona, on the very threshold of the promised land, having been led out of this wilderness by her brave sponsor, seems to have forgotten him in the hour of her brightest hope.

His colleagues, without an exception, still cherish the fond desire that he shall receive the reward which he so abundantly deserves, and that his name shall be indissolubly linked with Arizona the State as it is forever emblazoned on the brightest pages of the history of Arizona the Territory. [Applause.]

MARK SMITH, the jurist and the statesman, has commanded unqualified respect and attention. As an eloquent and impassioned orator he has thrilled a critical audience with admiration and delight; great as a lawyer and a forensic orator, he is greater still and dearer still as a man. Tender as a woman, brave as a lion, the soul of honor and of truth, utterly incapable of fearing an enemy or of disloyalty to a friend, a perfect exemplar of that debonair, winsome, and picturesque civilization which immortalized the old South, we bid MARK SMITH, the dear old friend and the ideal gentleman, a temporary adieu, assuring him that he will carry with him into his western home the tenderest memories and the truest friendship one noble man ever inspired in the warm heart of another. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire at this late hour to detain the House in arriving at a conclusion in reference to this great question which is now pending before us. I am a member of the Committee on Territories and had the honor to take part in reporting this bill, and am proud of it. It is no longer a question, as has been so well said by the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], that admits of argument, because both of the great political parties of the country have announced most solemnly in their platforms in favor of the admission of these two Territories as States of the Union. Therefore, both of the great political parties of the country, which absolutely control the destinies of the Republic, having declared in favor of the admission of these Territories, I take it for granted that a unanimous vote will record the will of those parties that represent all the people at large.

When this is done, then two new stars will be added to the flag of this Republic, which we all love and which we honor and respect, a flag that shelters this whole country, and beneath the folds of which we all stand seeking to promote the advancement and prosperity and development of all the people and the resources of this great land, which contribute so much not only to the development of our own people, but to the peace and prosperity and glory of the world at large. This result has been brought about not only by reason of the fact that these two great parties have declared in favor of it, but because of the further fact that the distinguished Delegate from New Mexico [Mr. ANDREWS] and the distinguished Delegate from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] have labored in season and out of season for its accomplishment. The distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], has lent a helping hand and been ready and willing at all times to further the advancement of this object. I trust that when these stars are added to the flag it will be an added brilliancy to the glory that the other States in their grandeur have given to this flag, which will give happiness and peace and prosperity to the country at large and be a blessing to the people to whom we give statehood. I trust the bill will promptly pass. [Great applause.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the character of the eulogy pronounced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] upon the distinguished Delegate from Arizona. It sounded somewhat like an obituary. A strong impression prevails that this is not the final honor for that gentleman, but merely a stepping-stone to the Senate of the United States. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Trerritories has thoroughly considered every detail of this measure. It is a unanimous report. The rights of the Government and of the people are properly safeguarded. One statement has been made which I desire to correct. It has been charged that the Government of the United States has not kept faith with the people of New Mexico and Arizona in not granting to them statehood prior to this time. The statement has gone unchallenged that there was a provision for immediate statehood in the treaty of 1848 between the United States and Mexico and under which the Territory of New Mexico was ceded to the United States. In order that the RECORD may show distinctly that no such article was ever incorporated into the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, I desire to read section 9, which refers to that subject:

The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceeding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and be admitted, at the proper time (to be judged of by the Congress of the United States), to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution.

Under the provisions of that treaty it is expressly stipulated that statehood shall not be granted to the territory ceded to the United States until so decreed by Congress. I hope this will silence the oft-repeated assertion that the Government has failed to redeem its treaty obligations in regard to these two Territories.

The struggle of New Mexico for statehood has extended over a long period of time. The great prize has been within her grasp a number of times, only to disappear with the expiration of a Congress. The first attempt for statehood was made in 1850. The status of New Mexico was a subject of contention in the great omnibus bill of Henry Clay, the last of his famous compromises for the preservation of the Union. Under the provisions of that measure California was admited as a State, but New Mexico was organized into a Territory. Thus her early aspirations for statehood were sacrificed in the preliminary struggle for nationality. The people of New Mexico evidently understood that they were to be given immediate admission into the Union. A convention was called, a constitution framed, submitted to and adopted by the people, and Senators and a Member of Congress elected. They had traveled as far as Missouri when they learned of the adverse action of Congress. Arizona was a part of New Mexico at this time and remained so until 1863.

The second attempt was made in 1874–75, when Senator ELKINS of West Virginia was the Delegate in Congress from New Mexico. An enabling act passed the House by a vote of 160 to 54. This measure passed the Senate in an amended form by a vote of 32 to 11. This vote in both House and Senate indicated an overwhelming sentiment for admission over a quarter of a century ago.

If New Mexico was qualified for statehood at that time, with all the progress that has since been made, it can not be contended now that she is lacking in any of the essential factors of statehood. Unfortunately for the fate of that bill the amendments proposed in the Senate necessitated a conference. It was so late in the session that it was impossible to adjust the differences between the two Houses, and the bill died in conference. The same measure passed the succeeding Senate by a vote of 35 to 15. It was reported favorably by the House Committee on Territories, but was never reached on the calendar. The third fight for statehood began in 1890, and has been waged with untiring zeal down to the present time. In 1906 a bill providing for joint statehood between New Mexico and Arizona passed the House of Representatives. The bill passed the Senate after a proviso had been incorporated, which submitted the question to a direct vote of the people of the Territories. It was made mandatory under this proviso that a majority of the votes in each Territory should be cast in favor of joint statehood or the provisions of the act should be null and void. Arizona refused to sanction the proposal, and the measure failed. Joint statehood is forever doomed. It would be impossible to pass another such measure through Congress. The question now is separate statehood or a continuation of territorial government.

New Mexico comes with splendid qualifications for admission as a member of the Union. This fact has been recognized by both great political parties in their platforms of 1908. Both documents contain an unequivocal declaration in favor of immediate admission.

Population has always been considered the leading qualification of statehood. During the whole course of our history it has been customary to admit a Territory when it contained a sufficient population for one Member of Congress. The ratio of representation at the present time, approximately stated, is one Member of Congress to every 185,000 of people. If this were the only standard, New Mexico's title to admission is perfect. According to the census of 1900 there were 195,310 people residing within her boundaries. It is evident, however, from the school enumeration and other public documents of unquestioned authority, that the population of New Mexico was at least 225,000 in 1900 and has greatly increased since that time. From July, 1906, to October, 1907, there were 23,223 land entries made in that Territory. Each of those entries represents a family, which would indicate an increase of at least 100,000. The great influx of farmers from the East into western Texas and eastern New Mexico is a matter of common knowledge. New Mexico has at the present time a greater population than any other State at the date of admission except Oklahoma. I shall include in my remarks a table showing the date of admission and population of a number of States of the Federal Union.

State.	Date of admission.	Population.
Tennessee	1796	35,691
Ohio	1802	43,365
Louisiana	1812	76,556
Indiana	1816	24,520
Mississippi	1817	[a]40,353
Illinois	1818	12,282
Missouri	1821	66,557
Minnesota	1858	6,077
Oregon	1859	13,294
Kansas	1861	107,206
Nevada	1864	6,857
Nebraska	1867	28,841
Colorado	1876	39,864
North Dakota	1889	135,177
California	1850	92,597

[a] Including Alabama.

A conservative estimate of the present population of New Mexico is 350,000. The evidence to sustain this statement is so conclusive that by common consent we have granted New Mexico two Members of Congress in the pending measure.

The character of the people is perhaps the second qualification in importance for statehood. It is perhaps sufficient to state that 93 per cent of the people of New Mexico are American-born citizens. This is undoubtedly a greater per cent of native-born Americans than can be found in any other State in the Union. The foreign-born inhabitants in Idaho constitute 21 per cent of her population; Utah, 22 per cent; Wyoming, 24 per cent; Washington, 25 per cent; Montana, 43 per cent; and North Dakota, 45 per cent. When we refer to many of the older States New Mexico has the same advantage in comparison. In 1900 Michigan had 22 per cent foreign-born population; New York, 26 per cent; Minnesota, 29 per cent; and Massachusetts, 30 per cent. It is evident from the foregoing figures that as far as the character of the citizenship of New Mexico is concerned, they are on an equality with the rest of the country. It is contended, however, that 25 per cent of the people are of Mexican descent. That is true. But the younger generation are taking advantage of the free schools and making rapid strides in education. The character of these Mexicans needs no defense, as they have demonstrated their capacity for advancement and their high respect for law and order during the past fifty years.

New Mexico has made splendid progress along educational lines. In 1891 a public school system was introduced and has been extended throughout the entire Territory. Their common schools will favorably compare in efficiency with those of the older States of the country. It is even contended that she has already established too many institutions of higher learning. New Mexico has one state university, an agricultural college, a military institute, a normal university at Las Vegas, a normal school at Silver City, and a school of mines at Socorro. Her penal and charitable institutions are equal to every demand, and the unfortunate of the Territory receive the same care and consideration that characterizes every American community.

No financial standard has ever yet been established as a qualification for admission into the Union. But as evidence of the great industrial progress of the Territory, it is enough to state that the assessed valuation of property is over $50,000,000. From computations which will hardly admit of refutation it is found that the wealth of New Mexico will aggregate $300,000,000. This is but a promise of her great possibilities. Her resources in minerals, in timber, and the products of her soil are considered almost inexhaustible. Many of her valleys are rich in all the elements of production save that of water. Great irrigation projects are being planned that will fertilize and make fruitful millions of acres and build up homes for thousands of American people.

Mr. Speaker, New Mexico possesses every qualification for statehood. She has more than sufficient population. The character of her people is above criticism. The people of New Mexico have assembled there from all sections of the country—the North, the East, and the South. They have carried with them high ideals of both private and public life. They will build a State ready at all times to stand the severest tests and rise to the full dignity of a member of the Federal Union. Congress will perform an act of justice long delayed by recognizing the validity of her claims and crowning her long and historic fight with a grateful welcome into the sisterhood of States. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER]. [Applause.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it is a matter of sincere congratulation to all friends of home rule that at last Arizona and New Mexico are to be admitted to all the rights of sovereign States. In population, in natural resources, and by every principle of our free institutions they are justly entitled to statehood. For years and years I have been advocating this fundamental right [applause], and I am glad that finally it has come, so far as the House is concerned; and I indulge the hope that the other branch of the Congress will also respond to public sentiment and speedily pass this bill and make it a law before we finally adjourn. [Applause.] I also indulge the gratifying hope that when these two Territories become full-fledged States in the Union our distinguished colleague, Mr. SMITH, and some other good Democrat will be the Senators from Arizona [applause], and that our distinguished colleague, Mr. ANDREWS, and my good friend, Governor Curry, who is with us to-day, will be the first two Senators from New Mexico [applause]; provided, of course, that the Republicans control the legislature. [Laughter.] So let us all rejoice that the last two Territories are now to be made in all respects sister States, with all the rights that it implies, and in this connection I desire to say there is one other right that is near and dear to my heart, and that is home rule for Alaska, local self-government for Alaska—the grandest country on earth, the wonderland of the world, the richest asset in Uncle Sam's domains—and I hope the next Congress will grant Alaska territorial government, with all the rights ever possessed by any Territory. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, while I have the highest regard for the Delegate from Arizona, I feel it my duty to express the hope that the proposed State of Arizona will be strongly a Republican State and will elect a Republican Representative and two Republican Senators to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may have permission to print remarks on this subject for five days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I want to state one or two facts. I do not raise any political question. If this bill becomes a law it will incorporate into statehood all the remaining territory acquired from Mexico in 1848 and 1853. Now, the other fact is that when the commissioner on behalf of the United States met the commissioners on behalf of Mexico to form the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, the commissioners of Mexico said that all Mexican territory, including the Territories of New Mexico and Upper California, had been dedicated to freedom, and they asked to have written into the treaty a provision that it should forever remain free. Thereupon it was refused, and Mr. N. P. Trist, a treaty commissioner for the United States, wrote a short letter to James Buchanan, then Secretary of State, saying that he had received such a proposition from the Mexican commissioners and that he had spurned and rejected it, saying that if the territory to be ceded was covered over 1 foot thick with solid gold he would not consent that it should be forever free. [Applause.] Now it is free and ever to remain so. [Applause.]

It is a source of extreme congratulation to know that not one foot of the territory acquired by conquest and purchase from our sister Republic of Mexico became slave territory, as was originally intended. Texas, a province of Mexico when the latter seceded from Spain (February 24, 1821), through the connivance of citizens of the United States—Sam Houston, of Tennessee, and others—on March 2, 1836, issued a "declaration of independence" from Mexico, and after the decisive battle of San Jacinto, fought on Texas soil on April 21, 1836, the United States recognized Texas as an independent Republic, under a constitution authorizing the existence of slavery therein. This was after President Jackson (1830) had offered $5,000,000 to Mexico for Texas.

On March 1, 1845, by resolution of Congress, consent was given to erect Texas into a State, with a view to her admission into the Union. In August following Texas framed a constitution in pursuance of the resolution, which prohibited the emancipation of slaves and authorized their importation into Texas. Under this constitution Congress formally admitted Texas into the Union of States—the last slave State admitted into the Union.

By the terms and conditions of her admission four other States, with her consent, might be formed out of her territory, those lying south of 36° 30′ north latitude should be admitted as slave States, and those north of that line should be admitted without slavery. It was then ascertained that no part of Texas was within 200 miles of 36° 30′.

Soon (May 13, 1846) war was, on a miserable pretense, declared by the United States against Mexico, the object being to acquire more territory to dedicate to slavery. By September, 1847, the conquest of Mexico was complete, and it only remained to by treaty and purchase secure sovereignty and title to the coveted region.

This acquisition thus sought was, according to Thomas Benton, himself a slaveholder, to answer the cry for more room for slaves. Benton, in his Thirty Years' View (Vol. II, p. 680), says of the real character of the war with Mexico that:

> The truth was an intrigue was laid for peace before war was declared! And this intrigue was even part of the scheme for making war. It is impossible to conceive of an administration less warlike, or more intriguing, than that of Mr. Polk. They were men of peace, with objects to be accomplished by means of war. * * * They wanted a small war, just large enough to require a treaty of peace and not large enough to make military reputations dangerous for the Presidency.

It is now conceded history that the design and purpose of declaring war against Mexico was not to redress an international grievance but to acquire territory.

Even the great Clay, of Kentucky, had declared that it was cruel to limit slavery extension and thus starve it to death. Senator Cass justified the acquisition of more slave territory on the proclaimed doctrine of "manifest destiny."

Senator Corwin, in his great Mexican war speech, responded:

> But you still say you want room for your people. This has been the plea of every robber chief from Nimrod to the present hour. I dare say, when Tamerlane descended from his throne, built of 70,000 human skulls, and marched his ferocious battalions to further slaughter, I dare say he said, "I want room."

Interesting as this line of talk may be historically, I can not pursue it at length here.

The commissioners, on behalf of the two nations, met at Guadalupe Hidalgo, and a treaty was signed there February 2, 1848, almost exactly sixty-one years ago.

By this treaty, for $15,000,000, to be paid by the United States to Mexico, New Mexico and Upper California were ceded by Mexico to the United States, and the Rio Grande, from El Paso to its mouth, became the boundary line between the two countries.

Upper California is now the State of California; and the New Mexico territory, as bounded at the date of the cession and as acquired, included much of the present New Mexico, nearly all of Arizona, substantially all of Utah and Nevada, and the western portion of Colorado; in all, about 545,000 square miles.

By further treaty with Mexico (December 30, 1853), for $10,000,000, a large slice more of territory was acquired by the United States, which now constitutes the southern part of Arizona Territory and the southwest corner of the Territory of New Mexico. All the vast region so acquired was to be dedicated to human slavery, and slave States were promptly sought to be created out of it. A great contest arose, which precipitated or hastened the civil war. It was proposed by act of Congress to extend the Constitution of the United States over all the territory acquired from Mexico.

This was the Calhoun theory. He maintained that the Constitution did not of itself extend over acquired territory, and that when it did so extend it carried or protected slavery therein. This attempt failed. The friends of freedom sought to attach to bills in Congress to provide for territorial organizations out of parts of the Territories of New Mexico and Upper California the famous Wilmot proviso, which read:

> That no part of the territory acquired should be open to the introduction of slavery.

This, too, failed. It never became a part of any law of Congress, though agreed to by this House frequently.

The discovery of gold in California hastened its admission as a State. The bill passed Congress for the admission of California as a State in the Union August 13, 1850. It is, however, now enough to say that no part of the territory ceded to the United States by Mexico ever became slave.

If, as already stated, this bill becomes a law, the last of our Mexican-acquired territory will have been organized into States, and two more stars will be emblazoned on our flag. This happy event has come after a period of nearly two-thirds of a century's waiting, and when all, I believe, of those great statesmen and soldiers who were active in acquiring the coveted territory are in their graves, and after this country had been shaken to its foundation by war to preserve it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The question was taken, and, in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed. [Applause.]

R. 25553) for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company, and to recommit the same to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

House concurrent resolution 25, relating to tariff on zinc ores. By Mr. Wescott.

Whereas a large amount of the spelter manufactured in the United States is produced from ores mined in the State of Kansas; and

Whereas no zinc ore was imported prior to the year 1905, and during the last four years over 300,000 tons of Mexican zinc ores have been imported, which ores are produced by peon labor at one-third the cost of producing ores in the State of Kansas; and

Whereas the result of said importation of foreign ores is the curtailment of development and operation of zinc mines in the State of Kansas, and has resulted recently in the material reduction of wages, throwing out of employment a large number of wage-earners and the closing of many zinc mines in this State; and

Whereas no tariff, up to the present time, has been asked on zinc ores owing to the fact that no foreign ores have been imported until recently; and

Whereas for the last forty years lead ore has been subject to an adequate tariff duty, the result of which is that the State of Kansas is to-day one of the largest lead-producing States in the Union, and since the cost of producing lead ore and zinc ore in the State of Kansas is the same: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That we favor a just and equitable import duty on all zinc ores, and that we request our Senators in the Senate of the United States and our Members of Congress to work and vote for such legislation as will save this important industry from destruction and produce a substantial revenue to the Government.

The above consurent resolution was offered in the house, rules suspended, emergency declared, read second time, and adopted February 11, 1909. Messaged to senate, read first time, rules suspended, emergency declared, read second time, and adopted February 11, 1909.

Senate concurrent resolution 16, relating to the placing on the retired list ex-Union officers of the civil war.

Whereas the Congress of the United States some forty years after the Revolutionary war, with a desire of expressing, in a measure, their gratitude to the surviving officers who had conducted that long, perilous but successful war, enacted a law placing the old patriots on the retired list, thereby enabling them to spend a few years freed from the cares and labor of providing the necessities of life; and

Whereas the same course was pursued with the survivors of the war of 1812, thus showing to the world that republics are not ungrateful, but, on the contrary, are ever mindful of the interests of their most humble citizens and regard with the most tender care their aged and decrepit patriots; and

Whereas nearly forty-four years have passed since the surrender at Appomattox and the number of these veterans of cherished memories is being rapidly reduced: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That we instruct our Senators and earnestly request our Representatives in Congress to give all assistance in their power to the enactment of a law that will place the surviving officers of the war of the rebellion on an equal footing in regard to the retired list as are officers of the Regular Army.

Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the senate and passed that body February 4, 1909.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is an exact duplicate of the resolution submitted the other day and adopted, directing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to furnish the information. That officer suggests that the information can be furnished without any cost by the Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior. The resolution simply changes the direction.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the Senate resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill on page 25, line 18.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 25, line 23, before the word "thousand," to insert the words "and fifty," so as to make the paragraph read:

Navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H.: Rebuilding and fireproofing building No. 20, $43,500; electric capstan for quay wall, $3,000; foundry building (to cost $250,000), $50,000; in all, $96,500.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs what character of work is done at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard that would require the immediate construction of a quarter-million-dollar foundry plant.

Mr. HALE. That, Mr. President, is one of the necessities developed by the present management in the department in cutting out things not needed and providing for essential things. A foundry, as the Senator well knows, is one of the essential things. One foundry to be used for the entire yard is one of the essential things, indeed, if you keep up the yard.

This provision does not make any appropriation, but under the recommendations of the Secretary, duly estimated for and asked for, the limit fixed of appropriations to be made by Congress whenever it chooses has been extended so that it may be a complete building.

While I think I have shown very clearly that the proportion of appropriations for public works at all the yards is very small, I do not mean in any way to be taken as agreeing to any proposition that while we maintain these yards there will not be necessary some buildings for the concentrated work of the yard, as the Secretary prescribes it. There will be no yards that will not need certain buildings—a power plant, a foundry, and certain other things. The estimate of the department is intended to meet that necessity.

Mr. DIXON. What I wanted specially to know is what special thing is being manufactured at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard that would call for the expenditure of a quarter million dollars for a foundry building alone.

Mr. HALE. The main work that is done at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, and it is in a measure true of other yards, is in the way of repairs. Another thing done there, which always has been done to great advantage, is the building of boats. They have a very competent and expert force of men there, and the yard heretofore has been utilized for the building of boats.

There is another thing that is being done at this yard which is required. I do not know how it would compare with the Puget Sound yard, but next to that, and on the Atlantic coast, it is the great sanitary resort. If a ship, as frequently happens, comes in from a southern cruise and needs every kind of fumigation, every kind of cleaning out, and cool weather, it is sent to this yard. That work can not be done without a proper force and without proper buildings.

The Senator may remember that after the battles off the coast of Cuba the ships needed to be overhauled, and they and the captured prisoners themselves, were sent to this yard, because of its great value in the way of sanitation.

While I can not give the Senator the details, I can assure him that the Portsmouth Navy-Yard is a busy place; that it has a very competent and expert set of workmen at its control; and that the appropriations are small.

Mr. DIXON. I still believe the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee has not answered the query which I propounded. For what purpose is a foundry building costing a quarter of a million dollars needed at the Portsmouth yard at this time? I know they manufacture boats there, but the manufacture of wooden boats would not call for a quarter-million-dollar foundry.

Mr. HALE. It does not.

Mr. DIXON. Neither would the sanitation of ships call for a quarter-million-dollar foundry.

Mr. HALE. It is no use to have a foundry unless you have a good one. The department say they can not get such a foundry as they require without the amount named in this limitation. There is no appropriation in the provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Maine that from my little observation a foundry embraces a machine shop to handle the castings afterwards, and the two works always go together—a foundry and a machine shop. The mere casting of iron for use in cranks, shafts, and propellers, and various other large castings, such as are used on ships, is only a primary object as compared with the machinery for turning those and smoothing them up and putting them in a condition to be used. I do not know about this particular building or anything connected with it, but it just occurred to me that that might be the meaning of this structure.

Mr. DIXON. Here is an item carrying a quarter million dollars for some specific object. All this general discussion of the needs of the navy is not pertinent to the simple question I asked, What is the immediate occasion of a quarter-million-dollar foundry building at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard? That is what I have asked, and I think it is a perefctly competent question and should be answered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's question is one somewhat difficult possibly to answer, yet the fact remains——

Mr. DIXON. It should not be.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it will be answered. Yet the fact remains that a foundry at a navy-yard is just as necessary as a machine shop or any other instrumentality for carrying on the work.

In the Portsmouth Navy-Yard there is an old foundry, built sixty years ago, I think. It is a menace every hour of every day to certain other valuable buildings that are in the immediate vicinity of it. It ought to be torn down to-morrow or to-day.

The need of a new foundry has been recognized by the technical men of the navy. It was recognized by the Navy Department itself, and after very careful consideration an estimate was forwarded here that a foundry should be built at a cost of $250,000. It is not a very large amount for a building of that kind.

The Senator asks what is being done; what have been the castings at the navy-yard.

Mr. DIXON. Yes; that is what I wanted to know.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator possibly is not aware of the fact that since the dry dock was built at Portsmouth, which was only four years ago, 41 vessels have been in that dock for repairs.

Mr. DIXON. What kind of vessels have those been?

Mr. GALLINGER. All kinds, large and small.

Mr. DIXON. As a matter of fact there has been but one battle ship docked there.

Mr. GALLINGER. But one battle ship very probably, but this was because we were not prepared to have battle ships go to the navy-yard until very recently. They could have sent them there, but the department did not think it was wise to do so until the channel was widened. I say 41 vessels have been in that dock. The dock has been used one day out of two since it was built.

I want to read very briefly what a naval officer says about this foundry. Speaking of the old foundry he says:

> The size of this foundry is exceedingly small, taking into consideration the fact that in a modern foundry plant it is now essential to provide core furnaces, core-making rooms, sand-preparing rooms, cleaning rooms, lavatories, and other important compartments. It is likewise absolutely necessary to provide storage room for flasks, sand, clay, pig iron, and other bulky supplies that are used in great quantities for foundry purposes.

Then he goes on to say:

> It is an absolutely dangerous menace to the coppersmith and forge shops of the Steam Engineering Department, as well as to the old boiler shop.

That is the present foundry.

> In order to provide a foundry which will possess sufficient floor and head room, that will be installed with suitable cranes, and which will possess facilities for the storage of bulky foundry supplies, and where there can be installed adequate railroad track facilities, an appropriation of at least $300,000 is required, $50,000 of which should be used for the building of storage bins. It is only necessary to state that if a reasonable amount of foundry work should be assigned this yard it would not be found possible to efficiently store more than two or three months' supply of all the bulky articles entering into foundry work.

Then, following that, the Secretary of the Navy made an estimate, which was sent here, asking for $250,000 for the construction of this building.

This naval officer further says, and it is a fact—

> In the consideration of the foundry problem, particular attention is invited to the fact that on board the modern battle ship there are installed heavy power tools, such as lathes, shapers, and drills. If the battle ships can only be furnished in an expeditious manner with castings, it is within the capabilities of the vessels to do the necessary machine work required upon the castings.

If the Senator would visit the Portsmouth Navy-Yard some time, and I hope he will, because I am sure that he is speaking through inadequate information on many of these points, he will discover that that is a very busy yard, that a very high type of skilled workmen are employed there, and that there is no idleness, but, on the contrary, the Government is getting a good return for all the money it is investing at Portsmouth.

I will appeal to the Senator because he is a reasonable man. If we are to have a new foundry at Portsmouth—it is very much needed, it is an absolute and immediate need—we ought to have a good one, and there is no particular reason why we should stick in the bark about an appropriation of $250,000 when the men who are best qualified to judge of the matter say that that amount is very much needed, and the naval officer from whom I have read says the amount ought to be $300,000.

But the Secretary of the Navy has sent his estimate here for $250,000, and there certainly is no reasonable excuse for not allowing it.

Mr. DIXON. I perfectly agree with what the Senator from New Hampshire says. If we are going to construct a navy-yard and build battle ships and repair battle ships, the foundry ought to be a good one; but, as a matter of fact, is it not a new departure for the Portsmouth Navy-Yard to do that heavy kind of casting called for in a $250,000 foundry building over the work that has been done there heretofore?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, it is conceded that in the present foundry they are not capable of doing the particular work that under modern conditions will be demanded. The Portsmouth yard is now equipped to do any kind of work practically; the only weak point there is in the yard to-day is the foundry; and that want ought to be supplied.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have no prejudice for one navy-yard over another. I am thoroughly convinced that we have duplicated this work up and down the Atlantic coast, and in many places at a vast expenditure of money we have equipped yards for which there is no present need.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator is making war on the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, I hope he will not select Portsmouth, for the reason that that yard is located where we have an abundance of land, of cheap land. There are hundreds and hundreds of acres of land there owned by the Government, and the yard is equipped in every possible way to meet all the modern requirements of the navy. But because it happens to be farther north than any other navy-yard and not a very great distance from Boston, I hope the Senator will not direct all his attention to this yard, with a view of undertaking to prove that it is unnecessary, because I will say to the Senator that when the navy-yards are decreased, if they are ever decreased, in my judgment the Portsmouth yard will remain a monument to the wisdom of the men who established it in 1800, and in view of the most excellent work that it has done from that time to the present.

Mr. President, the Senator's question is a proper one as to whether we need $250,000 to build a foundry, but if the Senator thinks we do not need that amount he is putting his judgment, which in the nature of things can not be very technical, against the judgment of the officers stationed at that yard and the Secretary of the Navy, who has visited the yard to my knowledge twice, and who has carefully looked into the needs of the yard.

Mr. DIXON. From all my observations of the Senator from New Hampshire, I think everyone will agree that his whole mental attitude is that of fairness. Certainly I have no prejudice against the Portsmouth Navy-Yard or the Boston Navy-Yard or the Charleston Navy-Yard. I believe a majority of the Senate does believe that the work is duplicated many times over at the various little navy-yards that this country now possesses. We equip a plant at Portsmouth to do certain work. We equip the same plant at Boston, 65 miles distant. If this was a private proposition, no great corporation on earth would duplicate plants within 65 miles of each other. I have no prejudice against the Charleston Navy-Yard, the navy-yard at Philadelphia or Key West, or anywhere; but undoubtedly we are spending vast sums of money in equipping these various yards about which there is a great question. Some one stated yesterday on the floor that Admiral Goodrich of the navy only three or four months ago recommended the abandonment of the Portsmouth Navy-Yard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and other admirals have testified that it is quite as necessary, if not more necessary, than any other yard on the Atlantic coast; and I can read the testimony of those admirals, if the Senator wishes to hear it.

Mr. DIXON. I do not question that statement in the least. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether, as a matter of good business policy, based on the economical expenditure of this Nation's money, he does not believe that there are more navy-yards on the Atlantic coast under present conditions than there should be?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say frankly, no; I do not think there are. I will say, furthermore, I think the Senator's contention that this work ought to be consolidated in one yard is very likely not well taken.

Mr. DIXON. I will say three yards.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know of no reason why a battle ship going into the Portsmouth yard for repairs, as three battle ships have been required to go there for that purpose, should be compelled to send to Boston, New York, or Philadelphia for castings. I know of no reason why they should not have a foundry making whatever is necessary to make those repairs.

Mr. DIXON. That is exactly what I am contending for. The trouble with the navy-yards, as I understand the situation, is this: On the Atlantic coast you can not take care of over two battle ships in any single one of them. If we had a naval engagement on the Atlantic Ocean and the battle fleet should be crippled, they would have to go one to Portsmouth, another to Boston, another to Philadelphia, another to Key West, another to Portsmouth, Va., for repairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. Where would the Senator establish this great establishment he has in mind?

Mr. DIXON. I do not know. I am not a naval expert.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is it. The Senator could not establish it in Boston; he could not establish it in New York; because there is no land there for that purpose.

Mr. DIXON. Possibly Portsmouth is one of the great naval bases. I am not arguing that part of it. I am arguing against the present method of dissipating the resources of the country in keeping up a dozen one-horse navy-yards that can not accommodate over one or two battle ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know a great manufacturing concern in New England that has a mill in five or six different cities, and they think it economy.

Mr. DIXON. That is probably true of our navy-yards for the purpose of peace.

Mr. GALLINGER. So are our mills.

Mr. DIXON. And our navy-yards for the purpose of peace are all right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to call the Senator's attention to this phase of the subject: He speaks of the necessity of having some one great naval base where we can repair a half a dozen or a dozen battle ships at one yard.

Mr. DIXON. I say three or four yards.

Mr. TILLMAN. You mentioned one yard.

Mr. DIXON. No; three or four.

Mr. TILLMAN. The magazine article which the Senator has been reading, which undoubtedly has fired his zeal, embraces one on the Pacific coast, one in the Gulf perhaps, and one on the Atlantic coast. But what I want to call his attention to is this: Suppose a naval engagement occurred somewhere in the Atlantic and our battle-ship fleet of 20 or 30 ships came in conflict with the British fleet of 50 ships, and we get licked. Then suppose the British fleet should have ships enough that were not harmed to beat our crippled ships to this one yard or naval base and blockade it. Where would our ships go then? Unless they could speed up and down the coast and go into this dock and that, they would be absolutely blocked out, and when they got where there was no navy-yard they could not be repaired at all, and all the other fleet would have to do would be to blockade our ports, and you have no navy.

Mr. DIXON. That is exactly what——

Mr. TILLMAN. It is a good thing to sit on the pinnacle of the Rocky Mountains and think of these things and read magazine articles and come here and teach men these things, and it is a good thing to have a man from the Rocky Mountains come into the Senate and tell us all this. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from the Rocky Mountains is just as patriotic——

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not question the Senator's patriotism; but I question his knowledge in this matter. I believe he is actuated by good motives; but his zeal outruns his discretion, because he has been reading some magazine articles which are full of lies.

Mr. DIXON. All right. As to whether they are full of lies or not is what I am trying to find out this morning, and plain answers to the questions that I ask need not rub anybody's feelings the wrong way.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are not rubbing my feelings the wrong way. I am just earnest about this; that is all.

Mr. DIXON. I am just as patriotic as the Senator from South Carolina ever dared to be; I am just as much interested in maintaining a fitting navy as the Senator from South Carolina ever dared to be; but I do believe, and I believe that the Senator believes, that we are annually wasting millions of dollars in the duplication of exactly the same plants at seven or eight places up and down this coast where we do not need them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. How can we be spending several million dollars a year when the appropriation for all the navy-yards in the country in this bill is only about $4,000,000 for all purposes?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from New Hampshire knows perfectly well that the bagatelle of $4,000,000 in this bill for repairs and construction in these navy-yards is not a drop in the bucket to what is actually expended at each one of these navy-yards. The pay roll at Portsmouth is how much a year?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know how much.

Mr. DIXON. How much, approximately?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know; but if the work was all done in one navy-yard, they would have to have these clerks employed in that navy-yard. I have never discovered that any consolidation of work in Washington has resulted in diminishing the number of clerks, nor has the Senator.

Mr. DIXON. How much is the annual pay roll of the Portsmouth Navy-Yard?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not looked it up.

Mr. DIXON. How much is it approximately?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should not care to make a guess, but it is not very large.

Mr. DIXON. Does it reach a million dollars?

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator mean for the workmen?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know how much it is; but supposing we admit that it is a million dollars, what then?

Mr. DIXON. How many workmen are there?

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. DIXON. How many approximately?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should say probably 300.

Mr. DIXON. How much is the land force, with a rear-admiral in command? You have got more clerks and rear-admirals and captains on land in charge of these workmen than you have at sea. That is what I am complaining of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Supposing that this great naval station, which the Senator from South Carolina has very well pointed out as probable, should be blockaded by a foreign fleet if we had a war and lost a battle; we would still have to employ those workmen there, and we should not save anything from the pay roll in that direction. We might cut off a few clerks possibly, but the saving would be inconsequential.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. LODGE. I simply call attention to the civil establishment to which the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] has referred, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] did not happen to have the figures. The average expenditure for the civil establishment at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard for ten years has been $9,500 a year.

Mr. DIXON. What does that include?

Mr. LODGE. That includes all of the civil establishment.

Mr. DIXON. How much per year?

Mr. LODGE. About $9,534.

Mr. DIXON. What percentage of men employed on shore are on the civil list? You have a rear-admiral in command. Does the amount given by the Senator include the pay of the naval officers?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; of course that does not include naval officers. They are paid anyway.

Mr. DIXON. But you would not need this great number of naval officers if you did not have these navy-yards duplicated.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator will find that we shall need naval officers.

Mr. DIXON. I am going to ask one or two pointed questions, and I want to say——

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana evidently has definite ideas with regard to these navy-yards, and he has expressed them with great clearness. I should like to ask him a question. He has alluded to the navy-yard at New Orleans, or the one at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and stated that no work had been done there. Now, does the Senator think because no work has been done there that there should be no navy-yard on the great Gulf of Mexico?

Mr. DIXON. I think there ought to be.

Mr. ALDRICH. In view of the possibility that war may happen after the construction of the Panama Canal, are we not to have any navy-yard on the Gulf and no place where one ship or a dozen ships in turn can go for repairs in case of difficulty? Does the Senator think that we should have no navy-yards on the south Atlantic coast? Charleston may not be the best place, but is it possible because perhaps no work is being done at Charleston to-day that we should not have, in view of the great national interests involved, a navy-yard on the south Atlantic coast?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say for the benefit of the Senator from Rhode Island that the naval board appointed to consider that question reported that Charleston had the best harbor on the Atlantic coast south of Norfolk—that of Hampton Roads.

Mr. ALDRICH. My own judgment is that there ought to be a concentration of naval work in Narragansett Bay; which I think is the best place on the whole coast.

Mr. DIXON. I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, from what I have heard of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But we are not ready for that, and it will take several years to complete the work of concentration. In the meantime, what does the Senator from Montana propose? Does he propose to abolish all these navy-yards, to dismantle them, and have no place whatever where the ships of the United States can go for repairs?

I suggest to the Senator that criticism and construction are two different things; and I hope that in the course of his remarks he will submit some plan and say what he favors, so that the Senate may know whether or not his suggestions are wise.

Mr. DIXON. That is exactly what I am leading up to. I want to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that certainly the south Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico ought each to have a naval base; but in this same bill that is reported a commission is provided for to look into the reorganization of the navy. Would it not be a good thing at this time to add a provision giving that commission, which should be composed of disinterested men, authority to recommend where the great naval bases should be, instead of year after year spending millions and millions of dollars in equipping navy-yards? I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not on the Committee on Naval Affairs and am not responsible for the details of this bill; but I understand that the commission to which the Senator refers is to be given absolute power to recommend whatever they see fit as to the reorganization of the navy, including the location of naval stations and naval bases.

Mr. DIXON. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my understanding about it.

Mr. DIXON. Is that the understanding of the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Montana has made a suggestion of value in the way of the dispatch of the public business when he says that he believes the Senate is tired of the present system and wants a change.

Mr. DIXON. I did not say anything like that. I did not say that.

Mr. HALE. What did the Senator say; that he thought the Senate——

Mr. DIXON. I said I believed that a majority of the Senate believe that millions of dollars of money are annually wasted in maintaining these navy-yards that have come down from a former generation, rather than expending the money in the maintenance of some great modern naval base. That is what I said.

Mr. HALE. That is what I supposed the Senator said. The only way that that can be tested is by a vote of the Senate. The only way that it can be tested is, as we come to the clauses that arouse the interest and criticism of the Senator, to let the Senate pass upon them. You can not pass upon them all together. If the Senator wants a vote on this proposition in relation to the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, the sooner we get that the better in the dispatch of business. I have a great many figures and statements in relation to that yard, but I am so desirous of pushing this bill along and letting the Senate vote upon it, clause by clause, as we reach them, that I am entirely willing now that the Senate vote on the proposition in this amendment. If it votes it out on the criticisms the Senator from Montana has made and believes with him that we have got an entirely wrong system as to navy-yards, the Senate will show that very quickly by its vote. Then we shall proceed to the next item and take the vote of the Senate on that, but I appeal to the Senator that, while it is not for me to say what length of time shall be spent by him in criticising generally, when he says that the Senate is in sympathy with him, the best way to test that is to have a vote. I would be willing now, without putting in the great bulk of papers that I have on this proposition, to let the Senate vote on this amendment. If it votes it out, that ends it.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from Maine make the candid statement to this Senate that a vote on this item would honestly determine whether or not a majority of the Senate believes that millions of dollars are not being wasted annually?

Mr. HALE. It is one of the items. Every navy-yard here has an item, and when the Senate votes them all out it will show that they do not want to spend any more money on navy-yards. You can not get at it in any better way than that. How does the Senator expect to get an expression of the Senate unless it is by a vote on the amendments as they appear?

Mr. DIXON. Of course every navy-yard has an amendment in this bill; there is no doubt about that; but I want to say, in candor and without any captious criticism of this bill, that the trouble with the naval bill, I think, is just this, and I am going to be perfectly candid about it. Of the 12 Senators who constitute the Naval Committee, I think 10 have navy-yards in their States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. DIXON. Am I wrong?

Mr. TILLMAN. There are 92 Senators. That would only leave 12 against 80.

Mr. DIXON. Suppose "the Senators from the Rocky Mountains," who have been referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, had charge of the great Reclamation Service, and a committee which reported annually an appropriation bill to carry on the construction of new reclamation work in the Far West was composed in the ratio of 9 to 11 of men from the districts immediately interested in the great expenditure of this money, does any Senator on this floor question that that committee would be very unanimous for that appropriation bill?

Mr. TILLMAN. They have been unanimous for it.

Mr. DIXON. We have never had a single dollar in appropriation bills for this purpose.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am speaking of the Senators here who have been in favor of the reclamation project. The entire Senate agreed as to that being a wise and patriotic thing to do; and it comes with bad grace from men on that side, who have been getting their share of chicks and eggs from the National Government, to get up and captiously criticise the rest of us, who are only doing the same thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, we have in the reclamation work done precisely what the Senator is opposing in the naval bill. We have been leaving the reclamation matter almost entirely to the western Senators and we have stood by them every time.

Mr. TILLMAN. And Indian matters and public-land matters are also left to those Senators.

Mr. HALE. Almost entirely.

Mr. GALLINGER. And we all vote for the bills.

Mr. HALE. And we all vote for them. Here in the East we say those Senators know more about such matters than we do. If the Senator will look up the RECORD he will find before he became a Member of the Senate, that the Reclamation Service—and I am glad he has named it—has been in control, as it should be, of the Senators who are most interested; but the Senate, with the entire assent of this side of the House and of all the eastern Senators has stood up and voted for everything that has been asked by the Reclamation Service.

Mr. DIXON. Not a single Senator in this Senate——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am sure the Senator from Maine does not desire to make a statement that might create a false impression. I do not understand that the Senator from Montana undertakes to speak for western Senators, or anybody but himself.

Mr. HALE. I do not know.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not understand that he is claiming to speak for any section.

Mr. DIXON. No; I am only speaking for the Senator from Montana.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is not a sectional question. He is simply speaking for himself; and whatever criticism there is one way or the other should be confined to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; but the Senator referred—and I am glad he did—to the Reclamation Service. Now, Mr. President, I can only say that I am very desirous of proceeding with this bill. I should like, if we could, to escape a night session and still finish the bill; but the only way we can do it is, as we reach the amendments, to take a vote upon them. I am entirely willing to take a vote upon this proposition now.

Mr. DIXON. When I have completed my remarks, I am perfectly willing to have a vote taken. I do not intend to be taken off the floor until I have finished saying what is on my mind to say at this time.

I want the chairman of the Naval Committee to listen to what I am now trying to say, pursuing my argument, that the duplication of plants and power shops at various navy-yards leads to a first cost of articles produced many times in excess of what it should be. I am going to read from this article—not the whole article, for there are personalities in it that I would not think of putting into the RECORD—but some things that I want to know whether or not they be true. The first thing on the list that my eye falls on is an item in which the Senator from South Carolina is interested. The article says:

> Mr. TILLMAN is a forceful and aggressive man; he has been for years a fellow-member with Mr. HALE on both the Naval and Appropriation committees. He received his plant for a first-class navy-yard, in spite of the reluctant report of the board of naval experts considering the matter that neither Port Royal nor Charleston could be made a first-class naval station.

Is that charge true, or not?

Mr. TILLMAN. Here is the report. I suppose I can have it printed in the RECORD, or I will let the Senator examine it privately and see whether the report is "reluctant" or not. I will leave it to his judgment.

Mr. DIXON. Is it a matter of fact that the experts of the board reported adversely against the establishment of the Charleston yard?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, indeed, they did not. I think there were seven members of the board. I have their names here, and I think all of them but one reported in favor of the Charleston yard.

Mr. DIXON. That is what I want to know.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator ought to have found that out before he brought that magazine article in here.

Mr. DIXON. I have not had time to find out all I should like to know regarding these matters.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has got more time than some of the rest of us who have been here longer.

Mr. DIXON. And the Senator from South Carolina can answer it himself. He does answer it, and says it is not true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Frederick Rodgers, rear-admiral, United States Navy, president of the board; George A. Converse, captain, United States Navy; Peter C. Asserson, civil engineer, United States Navy; J. H. Linnard, naval constructor; E. H. C. Leutze, commander; and Sidney A. Staunton, lieutenant-commander. Those are the men who reported in favor of the Charleston yard.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to have that go into the RECORD.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will put it into the RECORD.

Mr. DIXON. I think it is due the Senator from South Carolina and the Senate, if this article is untrue in that particular, that the American people should know that it is untrue.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are very glad to have the Senator bring it in here and file it or indorse it to the extent of reading it as authority.

Mr. DIXON. I have not indorsed a thing. I do not know.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator is going to look about in the newspapers and magazines for muck rakers to bring trash in here, we will be certainly overwhelmed.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, if this were the only muck-raking proposition brought into the Senate it would interfere with the dispatch of public business but very little. The article continues:

> The plant of a first-class navy-yard (according to present American standards) is now nearly finished at Charleston. It has cost up to date some $3,000,000. The department, realizing the futility of trying to use it for the purpose for which it was designed, has now turned it into a station for torpedo boats.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let me say right here to the Senator for his benefit that I have the same opinion in regard to the feeling of the Navy Department that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] has in regard to New Orleans—that is, that there is a clique of naval officers up there who are under the influences, in New York and elsewhere, who have decided that the Charleston yard was unnecessary and undesirable, and therefore they are going to flyblow and smother it. What constitutes a good navy-yard—plenty of water?

Mr. DIXON. I should think that would be the first requisite.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. We have at Charleston as much water as will float without any trouble any battle ship in the fleet now constructed. The other day, when President-elect Taft started to Cuba, the Navy Department made haste to telegraph him at Augusta that they were afraid to send the North Carolina into Charleston. The naval officers who had informed the President-elect of the depth of water there and about the conditions had arranged before he left Washington that he should take ship at Charleston, but this influence which I have mentioned went to work to have him change his plans. Mr. Taft finally notified me by telegraph, "I will go out of Charleston if I have to go on a raft." With what result? The North Carolina went into Charleston without the slightest trouble and anchored alongside the custom-house. Any other battle ship we have can do the same thing when the Navy Department will permit it to go there.

Mr. DIXON. Then probably Charleston should be one of the great naval bases.

Mr. TILLMAN. Probably so. We have got anchorage room in Rebellion Roads, as they call them, inside the jetties, for a hundred battle ships, and there is deep water clear up to the yard—35 feet of water. What more do you want?

Mr. DIXON. That would seem to me to be the principal requisite.

Mr. TILLMAN. You want to get the prejudice against the South and southern yards out of your heart, sir.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from South Carolina now says that which is not true. I am a southerner. I was born in the South.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg your pardon if I have misjudged you. There are some people around Washington who think that anything south of the Potomac is unworthy of consideration. The next President himself, in his speech at Atlanta, recognized that by saying that he wanted the South hereafter to feel that we were not aliens governed by aliens.

Mr. DIXON. If I had any prejudice in this case, I would be wholly in favor, from a personal standpoint, of a yard on the South Atlantic coast and on the Gulf.

Mr. TILLMAN. Here we have from Norfolk to the Florida cape eight hundred or a thousand miles, and we have from Florida to the Rio Grande about 1,500 miles of coast, all fronting on the Panama Canal, in a way.

Mr. DIXON. There ought to be a great naval base in that territory.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Montana objects to having one yard on the South Atlantic coast, and he does not want any on the Gulf.

Mr. DIXON. I refuse to be put in any such position.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, then, what is the Senator's wish and purpose?

Mr. DIXON. I said that a great navy-yard should be on the South Atlantic coast.

Mr. TILLMAN. What is the Senator's purpose in bringing this muck-raking magazine article here and trying to back up the clique in the Navy Department that wants to destroy the Charleston yard? Why is he lending his great influence and the weight of his intellect to any such crusade as that?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Montana is not lending what intellect he has to the destruction of the Charleston Navy-Yard or any other navy-yard; but I say they ought to be consolidated.

Mr. TILLMAN. For instance, the Senator speaks of Boston and Portsmouth being 65 miles apart.

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. And then Boston and New York a little over 300 miles apart, and then Philadelphia, only about 80 miles down from New York. Here are Norfolk, League Island, New York, Boston, and Portsmouth—five great yards on the North Atlantic. Do you want none on the South Atlantic, when we have got as good a port as any of them?

Mr. DIXON. I have expressly stated to the Senator from South Carolina that my judgment is that there should be a great naval base in the South Atlantic. Will the Senator from South Carolina now answer a question that I want to ask him?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try to.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator believe it is a matter of economy and public policy to maintain two great navy-yards within 65 miles of each other?

Mr. TILLMAN. What did the Senator say? I could not hear.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from South Carolina believe it is a matter of economy or public policy to maintain great navy-yards within 65 or 80 miles of each other?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it is not for me to set up my judgment against the judgment of the great naval experts who have established these yards. I will recall the Senator's attention to the fact that some eighteen or twenty years ago it was proposed to abandon the navy-yards at Boston and Portsmouth and Sacketts Harbor, and for several years they were in a way abandoned, and nothing was done except to have a caretaker remain there. But since the Spanish war turned our people crazy on naval glory, and we have become a "world power," and the process of building up a great navy has set in, there has been a restitution of the old yards, except those at Sacketts Harbor and at New London, which are practically abandoned, and the navy-yards at Boston and Portsmouth and New York and League Island and Norfolk and Charleston were inaugurated as being first-class yards that should be established on the Atlantic coast. We go first backward and then forward. Now we have got a board in the Navy Department that wants to go back down hill again after we have nearly gotten on top. Portsmouth and Charleston are both attacked.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I am a member of the Naval Committee. From the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] it might appear that probably the members of the committee were influenced by their interest in their States in voting upon this bill. I want to say that I voted for this bill. It is true that I am but a young Member here and know very little about the navy, but I have no state interest here so far as navy-yards are concerned. We have no navy-yards in the State of Maryland. But I took great pains to ascertain, as a member of that committee, from those who were present the facts connected with this bill; and I want to say, as a member of the committee, that there was great interest manifested, and that there was a great deal of talk in regard to this bill. I want to say for the other members of the committee that I believe they have acted without any consideration for any state interest or personal interest, and that they are endeavoring to act in the interest of the whole country.

I was very much impressed, for I asked a great many questions in regard to this bill, with the manner in which this subject was treated. I do not think it is fair that the motives of the committee should be impugned simply because some members of the committee may have naval stations in their States. I have none in mine, and I voted upon this bill because I believed those who had charge of it were endeavoring to discharge a conscientious duty.

I have felt it my duty to make this statement to the Senate inasmuch as I am a member of the committee and a Democrat and have no state interest in it.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DIXON. I do.

Mr. HALE. I rise for the purpose of appealing to the Senator from South Carolina, and I will say any other Senator who is anxious for the progress of the public business, to allow the Senator from Montana to complete his criticisms or his speech, in order that we may have a vote. I am content to sit still under what the Senator says, and when he gets through let us see whether the Senate is disaffected to this bill. The Senator will do nothing by answering fully or answering portions of what the Senator from Montana may say, except to renew and repeat an extended discussion. It is much more in the interest of the public business that we get a vote. The Senator from South Carolina has demonstrated the value of the Charleston yard, and the committee stands by him, and I think he need not be sensitive at what the Senator from Montana says. I appeal to him, if he can, to join with me in holding fast to our seats while the Senator from Montana goes on and completes his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I take in good part the admonition of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. DIXON. I have the floor——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIXON. If he is going to follow the advice of the Senator from Maine, I should not think he would want the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. But I want one question answered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I will gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know if it is the Senator's desire and purpose to abandon the South Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and go to Guantanamo and build up a great naval base there?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I know nothing about Guantanamo.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the scheme which the Senator backs, and which he has exploited here and brought into the Senate, and of which that McClure Magazine article is one of the forerunners, which is now in full feather flying as far as it can go from the Navy Department, is to have all the South Atlantic and the Gulf coasts abandoned and go to a foreign country to build up a naval base which can be shelled from the open sea, whereas the navy-yard at Charleston is 7 miles from the ocean and can not be shelled, because the forts are right at the jetties on Sullivans Island, and would sink any fleet that came within reach of the navy-yard. This can not be said of all the navy-yards we have.

Mr. DIXON. What the Senator from South Carolina says, I think, describes a typical naval base as it impresses itself on my mind.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will just simply move some amendment and let the Senator from Maine get his vote, I shall be content; or, if he wants to talk on, let him talk.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Montana is not going to be put in the attitude by the Senator of talking for no purpose or of attempting any filibuster. Let us have that understood. I have not impeached any man's integrity or motive. I simply say that the members of the great Naval Affairs Committee are doing what every other man in the Senate would do. They are influenced by public opinion in their own States. I have not impeached the purpose of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. He has no navy-yard in his State; nor have I impeached the motive of any other man in the Senate. Still I notice on page 33 of the bill a Senate committee amendment which reads as follows:

Toward the construction of two concrete piers at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md. (to cost $250,000), $100,000; in all, $100,000.

Perfectly legitimate, I apprehend.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I beg pardon.

Mr. DIXON. I say I notice a Senate amendment on page 33:

Toward the construction of two concrete piers at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md. (to cost $250,000), $100,000; in all, $100,000.

Perfectly legitimate. I am not questioning the item or questioning any man's motive, except I say we are all human. The chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee made the statement in the Senate yesterday that last year the appropriations were $122,000,000; this year $137,000,000; next year he estimated they would be $160,000,000, and in 1911, $200,000,000. I did not hear the Senator from Maine make that statement, but in the paper this morning it is said the Senator made that statement yesterday. It was news to me. I did not hear it. At this time, when we are facing a deficit of $150,000,000, as I understand, this year, something ought to be done, and instead of increasing the naval appropriations by $16,000,000 over last year, we at least ought to go slowly. Why put in these appropriations for these various navy-yards at a time like this, when the bill already provides for a commission to examine into the general affairs of the navy; and I hope it will contain a provision to report what are the navy-yards that should be continued and enlarged. I think it is a mistake to increase the deficit by many million dollars.

The Senator from Maine said yesterday that the bill had grown from $13,000,000, as I remember, twenty-five years ago to $137,000,000 at this time, and he conveyed the intimation that Congress could not be stopped from making these great appropriations. Personally I took no censure to myself. A year ago I voted for two battle ships and against the four battle ship programme.

I want to read a little more to find out whether these statements which have been scattered all over the country are true or false. If I stood indicted by an article like this I would answer it on the floor of the Senate. The great American public believe these magazine articles, whether true or false. They are largely inclined to. I believe, as a matter of self-respect for the Senate and for Congress and for the administration, we ought to answer charges made openly and scattered in hundreds of thousands of copies all over this country. I was glad to hear what the Senator from South Carolina said with respect to the insinuation against the Charleston Navy-Yard. I do not believe the Senator from South Carolina would make a statement on the floor of the Senate that is not true. I will take his word against any magazine article. I want to continue the reading, and let us find out whether or not these things are true.

Continuing, regarding the Charleston Navy-Yard, the article says:

The department, realizing the futility of trying to use it for the purpose for which it was designed, has now turned it into a station for torpedo boats. It contains a dry dock intended to take in the largest battle ships. A machine shop, costing nearly $300,000—perhaps the handsomest in the navy—has been turned into a storehouse, without ever being used for the purpose it was built for.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. DIXON. I should really like to be enlightened.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will have to be very brief, because the Senator from Maine I know is impatient, and I do not want to retard the progress of the bill.

I will say for the Senator's benefit, once for all, that the ground for the Charleston Navy-Yard was broken about eight years ago. The dry dock has been under consideration, and work on the shops and the caissons for the opening of the dock and the dredging into the dock, so that ships could enter through the channel, has been going on. It is in a condition like a manufacturing establishment; for instance, a steel plant. The steel trust is constructing a great steel plant somewhere out West, at a cost of $10,000,000, and it is not doing a dollar's worth of work there yet, and it will not until it gets through with its construction.

Mr. DIXON. How long has this machine shop been built?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know; two or three years. It is ready to do the work, though, if you can get some one to send a battle ship there. Will the Senator undertake to go to his friends in the navy who arm him with this stuff and get a battle ship sent there?

Mr. DIXON. I am not on the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not a question of being on the Naval Affairs Committee. I am on the Naval Affairs Committee, and I can not get one sent there.

Mr. DIXON. I am as innocent as an unborn child in a matter of this kind.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that Senators must not take the floor except by first addressing the Chair. Securing the right to the floor once does not entitle the Senator to continue resumptions of the floor. The Chair will feel that, in the interest of the expedition of public business, it will be necessary to enforce this rule.

Mr. DIXON. Now, continuing, he says:

Some $3,000,000—

This is the navy-yard at New Orleans, and this article charges:

Some $3,000,000 has now been spent here, and $10,000 worth of work turned out. This is not because it has been unprepared to do work; it has been equipped sufficiently for some years. But as it is 75 miles up the swift current of the Mississippi from a part of the Gulf coast where our battle ships seldom go, there is small demand for its services. It, however, continues to grow. The Secretary of the Navy, in last winter's hearings before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, recommended that no more money be spent here. Congress then appropriated $76,000 for extending the plant, this sum including, in the minor items of sewers and conduits, more money than all of the work ever done in the plant.

Mr. McENERY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. McENERY. In regard to the naval station at New Orleans, I will say to the Senator from Montana that it is a new station, having been established quite recently, since the commencement of what is called the "new navy." The Congress of the United States, supposed to be on the recommendation of the Navy Department, passed an act establishing a naval station on the Gulf. A commission of naval officers was sent on the Gulf coast to select a site for a naval station. The last chairman of the commission was Admiral Bunce, who was one of the ablest officers at that time in the navy, or probably one of the ablest ever in the navy. He examined this site and located the naval station at New Orleans.

That station is prepared to repair any battle ship in the navy. It has all of the machinery, all of the appliances, and that no ships are sent there is the fault of the Navy Department. It will take those little cruisers, gunboats, serving on the South American coast that need repairs and send them to its favorite navy-yards at Norfolk and at Brooklyn. The station at New Orleans is ready to receive these ships and repair them, but in the hostility of the Navy Department against this station, recently developed, they refuse to send any vessels there. Not only that, but they absolutely refuse and decline to use the appropriation passed by Congress for the yard.

Now, as to the harbor, a ship drawing 25 feet can go as easily into New Orleans as a skiff. There is no trouble whatever. They are improving the harbor by making jetties at the Southwest Pass, and in a few months ships drawing 35 feet will be able to go to New Orleans. From the Head of the Passes to New Orleans there is no lack of water from 100 to 200 feet deep. The largest ships that go to New Orleans, some of them carrying 20,000 bales of cotton, go right to the wharf and receive their cargoes.

I desire to say one word about the usurpation of authority by the executive department. They want to abolish these navy-yards. They do not desire an act of Congress to do it. They think they can do it in spite of any action of Congress simply by withholding appropriations made to those navy-yards and declining to make estimate for future appropriations, in direct antagonism to Congress. They have no more authority to abolish those navy-yards than I would have by my simple ipse dixit to say they shall be abolished. If they want to abolish them, they ought to come to Congress and get an act and not withhold appropriations and render the yards useless and then say they are not fit for the purposes for which they were established and ask for their abolishment.

Mr. DIXON. That carries out exactly the line of my at least intended argument that we have twice as many naval stations at this time as the navy needs. The Senator from Louisiana, whose word is as good as that of any living man, says he has a navy-yard fully equipped, at a cost of several million dollars, with a 35-foot channel, and only $10,000 worth of work has ever been done in the $3,000,000 yard. I ask the Senator——

Mr. McENERY. That is the fault of the Navy Department in not sending ships there——

Mr. DIXON. That is what I say.

Mr. McENERY (continuing). In pursuance of their policy to finally get rid of it.

Mr. DIXON. I want to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee if he believes it is good policy to establish a $3,000,000 navy-yard and then do only $10,000 worth of work in the $3,000,000 plant, taking into consideration the force of mechanics naturally there, the great yard equipment maintained, the marine barracks? Is it good business policy to put a $3,000,000 plant in operation to produce $10,000 worth of repairs?

Mr. HALE. It may be.

Mr. DIXON. I did not understand.

Mr. HALE. It may be.

Mr. DIXON. It may be good policy?

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Montana permit me to say a word?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, a good many years ago, when I was a Member of the other House, I was on the Naval Committee. I was one of the gentlemen who inaugurated the plant at New Orleans. I took an active part in it, for many good reasons, as I thought.

In the first place, the current of the Mississippi does run about 4 miles an hour, but any steamship can get up there any afternoon by its own propulsion, without a tow. There is nothing in that. The tremendous advantage that a ship has in being docked there is the fresh water. The toredo is the enemy of vessels in tropical seas, and the toredo can not live in fresh water. Consequently there is a tremendous advantage in having a fresh-water dock and a navy-yard in which seagoing vessels can be placed for repairs, because it is the death of the worm and also of the barnacles which rapidly accumulate upon the bottom of the ship. There are two reasons.

Now, as to the cost. It is true that there is no work done there, because there is none there to be done; but I will ask the Senator to think for a moment of this situation: We might have a scene of active naval hostilities in either the Caribbean or the Gulf of Mexico. Suppose after a naval battle we wanted immediate repairs to prepare the ships for another battle. We might have needed it after Santiago, except that the happy results of that conflict made it totally unnecessary. Then, we would find it very convenient to have a port so secure from the enemy as the one 75 or 100 miles inland and defended by two forts below it on the river; a navy-yard that would clean the ship's bottom of barnacles and also kill the toredo and where ample work could be done.

A further great reason, as I recollect, for locating the navy-yard at that place was that New Orleans, being a large commercial port, had a great body of skilled artisans accustomed to ship work, accustomed every day to do work for ships that came there upon peaceful missions, and they could be immediately transferred across the river to the dockyard at Algiers and made available, without maintaining there a great army of laborers in time when no repairs were needed.

In my opinion, if there is a dockyard in the South which ought to be maintained it is this one, because, as I have said, it is the dockyard to which ships from the Mexican Gulf and the Caribbean can go if they need repairs.

I did not intend to interrupt the Senator, but that was information which I wanted to give.

Mr. DIXON. I am glad to hear the statement. As I understand, there is one dock at New Orleans. Suppose a battle fleet, having been in battle in the Gulf, with half a dozen or eight or ten ships injured, seeking a port where the ships could get into dock and be repaired. Suppose they sought the navy-yard at New Orleans. There is one dock there. It carries out exactly my argument that you have dissipated your means—one dock at New Orleans, one at Portsmouth, one at Charleston. There ought to be three or four great naval bases with half a dozen docks. I think New Orleans on the coast ought to present a good place for a naval base.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. MONEY. The gravamen of the Senator's complaint, as I understand, is that so much money has been expended and no work done. If you want, say, three docks instead of one, then there will be a very much greater amount of money expended in the plant and no work would be done, because there is none to do. So his charge grows graver instead of lighter; and if his plan is pursued, we will be expending an enormous sum of money with no more results in the way of repairs than we have to-day. Of course it is a very fortunate thing for this country if there are no naval conflicts with such damage to our ships as to require the expenditure of money for repairs, and it is very lucky that we have not expended a hundred thousand instead of $10,000 at New Orleans.

Mr. DIXON. It is lucky it has not been any larger at any of these places.

Mr. MONEY. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I am glad to hear the statement as to this channel. I understand this dock has been there eight years, and that but one battle ship has been docked in that time. A naval officer has made the statement that a ship waited three weeks for high water to get into the dock. If those things are not true, the Senate ought to know it and the country ought to know it.

Mr. McENERY. I was there when that ship was docked. She never had to wait any length of time.

Mr. DIXON. I am glad to hear that statement.

Mr. McENERY. She was docked right off the bank where, I presume, within 2 feet of it was 40 feet of water.

Mr. DIXON. The article continues:

New Orleans, for example, was so unfortunate as to secure but $1,040.01 worth of work in the naval year of 1907. The cost of maintaining this station during that year was $97,178.49, while $308,332.35 more was expended, with rare optimism, on improvements. There were $41,644.37 worth of naval officers and enlisted men stationed about this establishment during that uneventful year, while $20,000 worth of marines guarded it day and night.

Key West in 1907 had an unusually busy year. It did $7,126.18 worth of work, against $3,109.94 the year before. Its maintenance charges amounted to $139,908.32, but it secured only $40,109.75 for improvements. It was, however, cared for by $48,882.36 worth of naval officers and sailors and guarded by $12,000 worth of marines.

I wish again to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee if he thinks that is an economical, businesslike expenditure of money? [A pause.] I say I want to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee if he thinks that is a businesslike, economical expenditure of money?

Mr. HALE. I am not going to be drawn into a discussion with the Senator. All this has been gone over; and if I have not made an answer covering the comprehensive policy of the navy-yards, I can not make it now. I am not going to be drawn into a discussion by the Senator.

Mr. DIXON. I understand the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee declines to discuss the proposition——

Mr. HALE. I have already discussed it.

Mr. DIXON. Whether or not the expenditure of over $200,000 in one year at Key West, which did $7,000 worth of work, is a wise and economical expenditure of public money.

Charleston, established in 1901, was not prepared to work in 1907. It cost $113,671.82 to maintain it in the latter year and $323,773.74 to improve it. There were $36,493.46 worth of officers and $25,000 worth of marines on the grounds.

I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if that is approximately the amount of money expended in the Charleston Navy-Yard during the last two years? [A pause.] The Senator from South Carolina evidently did not hear my question, and I will ask him whether or not that is approximately the correct situation at the Charleston Navy-Yard?

Mr. TILLMAN. You will have to repeat the statement.

Mr. DIXON (reading):

Charleston, established in 1901, was not prepared to work in 1907. It cost $113,671.82 to maintain it in the latter year and $323,773.74 to improve it. There were $36,493.46 worth of officers and $25,000 worth of marines on the grounds.

Was there any work done at the Charleston Navy-Yard?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will take it for granted there was none, because, as I told the Senator a little while ago, the yard is only about ready to do work. But I call his attention to the fact—suppose those officers and marines had not been there? They would be on the pay roll. They had to be kept up. It would not have saved a dollar whether they were there or wherever they might be.

Take the Capitol building. We have $25,000,000 invested in the building. We have a force of employees to take care of it. We use it only three or four months during the short session and five or six during the long session. In other words, half the time nobody is here; but it is here for our business, and that yard is there for public business. What is the Senator going to do with the army? We spend sixty or seventy million dollars to maintain the army. They are not fighting. What are they doing? They are no account, because the Senator has not got the army shooting somebody.

Mr. DIXON. But we do not spend $25,000,000 a year in building machine shops and arsenals for which——

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; we have already. It is a dead plant six months in the year, and so the Senator wants to abandon it because we can not use it twelve months.

Mr. DIXON. All right; I will read again:

> The fifth southern yard made a much handsomer showing. In 1907 it accomplished $214,126.32 worth of work; while it cost only $488,946.71 extra to maintain it, with $128,709.94 more for improvement. About $112,000 worth of officers, sailors, and marines looked after it. This yard, it will be seen, was the only one which produced more than a dollar's worth of work for every $25 spent upon it.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. PILES. I think the fallacy in that portion of the article which the Senator has just read consists in this, that the author of the article undertakes to show, as I understood from the Senator's reading of it, that it costs something like $100,000 for the officers and men to look after the yards. This on its face would appear to be a fair statement, but when analyzed it is, I think, altogether erroneous. It is not necessary for all of the officers and marines who are frequently at the yards to be there for the purpose of looking after or protecting the yards.

When the ships go into the yards to be docked and repaired, the marines and officers go on shore, to a very large extent, until their vessels are ready to go to sea. The expense of the officers and men to the Government is practically the same when on shore as it is when they are at sea; their pay and other expenses go on whether on shore or at sea. If the men are not at the yards, they are somewhere else at the expense of the Government.

Mr. DIXON. Oh, no; the Senator is certainly mistaken.

Mr. PILES. No; I am not mistaken. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. DIXON. There would not be the same necessity for maintaining the same immense number of officers and marines.

Mr. PILES. Let me ask the Senator a question: We have so many officers and so many marines in the service, have we not?

Mr. DIXON. We have whatever the exigency of the service demands. If we did not have 13 naval stations and yards, we would not need this number.

Mr. PILES. We can not get enough enlistments in the Marine Corps. If the Senator lived on the coast, he would recognize that fact. On the coast they are advertising for marines all the time. We can not get men enough there. We are always short of men. The fact is we have a certain number of men in the navy. We have officers and marines. What are you going to do with those officers and marines?

Mr. DIXON. You would have no need for many of them, if all of these unnecessary navy-yards were not maintained.

Mr. PILES. That is not the fault of the navy-yards. Are you in favor of reducing the navy—the officers and the enlisted men and the marines in the navy? Are you in favor of that? Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. DIXON. Not at all. I am in favor of retaining every officer and every man who is necessary to man the navy.

Mr. PILES. Let me make the point plain. There are so many officers and marines in the navy. We must have them. We try to get more all the time. We are trying to get a fleet on the Pacific coast. When the fleet was around there every commercial body on the Pacific coast petitioned the Secretary of the Navy to retain part of the fleet there, but it was said that could not be done, because the navy-yards on the Pacific coast were inadequate to take care of the fleet.

I hope to see navy-yards on the Pacific coast sufficiently equipped to take care of a fleet which will be adequate to protect the rights of the people who live on that coast.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Washington is no more anxious for the accomplishment of that purpose than I am, but we are never going to get it as long as we maintain all these little one-horse yards up and down the Atlantic coast from 50 to 65 miles apart.

Mr. PILES. On the Pacific coast they are 800 miles apart.

Mr. DIXON. I am surprised at the Senator from Washington apparently sympathizing with the present purpose and policy of the maintenance of these little yards, which are certainly not necessary.

Mr. PILES. I will say to the Senator from Montana that I do not know anything about the navy-yards on the Atlantic coast, from a practical standpoint, because I have not investigated them; but I do know that the argument the Senator is making in respect to the expense of keeping officers and marines at the navy-yards applies with as much force to the Pacific-coast yards as to the Atlantic-coast yards.

Mr. DIXON. Certainly, it does.

Mr. PILES. I want, if I can, to impress the Senator with the fact that that expense would be incurred any way.

Mr. DIXON. It is beyond my mathematical comprehension that it takes as many men and officers to have charge of 6 or 8 navy-yards as to have charge of 15, and I do not think anybody else can have a comprehension of that argument. There is a rear-admiral in charge of every one, with a staff of officers.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that we have on the pay roll 43,589 sailors and 9,305 marines. They have to remain somewhere. Where is there a better place for them than in the navy-yards?

Mr. DIXON. What per cent of naval officers are detailed to the navy-yards at this time?

Mr. PERKINS. I am unable to state the number.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; he is acquainted with that matter.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator could see that the building up of the navy, the immense increase in officers and men and marines, has not the least thing to do with the navy-yards. It is the tremendous development of the ships and the fleets that has called for these expenditures. The navy-yards have not figured in it. When you have this establishment, enormous as it is, you have to take care of the officers and men, and they will be assigned to navy-yards and naval stations, and their pay will go on just the same.

It is entirely an unfair statement to arraign a navy-yard because of this immense force. We have certain marines and certain men and certain officers who are sent to the navy-yards. If you reduced the number of navy-yards and had only two or three, you would find the result just as I showed yesterday in Great Britain. Instead of being decreased the expense would be enlarged. The expense of England for her three navy-yards and everything upon them is more than twice what ours is for all our yards. The Senator has got on the wrong tack about this.

Mr. DIXON. Then, I want to be enlightened, if I can.

Mr. HALE. I am afraid——

Mr. DIXON. I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs can do it. I have no other purpose in view than to have some enlightenment on this proposition.

Mr. President, I have nearly concluded. I am not filibustering here to try to defeat the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana for what purpose he is filibustering, if not with the purpose to beat the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Montana is not filibustering at all.

Mr. HALE. He certainly is not ready to come to a vote.

Mr. DIXON. Here is a bill carrying $138,000,000, and we have had one day and a quarter to consider it. Is that filibustering?

Mr. HALE. We have not reached a vote.

Mr. DIXON. Has it reached such a point in the Senate that a Senator has not a right to ask a question upon a bill carrying $138,000,000?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly he has, and there is not any effort to suppress that. The only thing I have sought in charge of the bill is to take the sense of the Senate. The Senator is not the only Senator who has responsibility here and who is, to a degree, accountable for the passage of this enormous bill. There are a great many other Senators who are just as patriotic as he is and who are presumed to be as much interested in this great bill as he.

I am willing, as we reach the portions of the bill that are pertinent and practical, to submit the whole thing to the Senate for its action. I am bearing in mind the fact that the time is waning, and if we have undue delay upon this bill—the repetition of questions, quoting from magazines, and all that—we will be in great trouble with the other appropriation bills. I am hoping to get this bill through to-day, so that we shall not be compelled to have a night session. If we do not, I shall submit to it—and all the rest of us; but I do not want the Senator to assume, as he seems to do, that he is the only person here. Here, sitting around him, are 80 or 90 Senators.

Mr. DIXON. I am willing to acknowledge the leadership of the Senator from Maine on this floor. I am willing to acknowledge his great control of naval affairs here; but when he makes that insinuation, I say that I am just as patriotic as the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I know there are 91 other Senators here; and I have the same right to ask these questions as the other 91.

Mr. HALE. Precisely.

Mr. DIXON. I do not demand anything more nor will I accept anything less.

Mr. HALE. All that I ask is that when a Senator has taken what he thinks a reasonable time we may be allowed to come to a vote. We will never pass bills if that is not done.

Mr. DIXON. There is no purpose on earth in my mind to try to prevent this bill from coming to a vote, nor has there been.

Mr. HALE. I am ready for a vote at any time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have listened practically to all of the argument of the Senator from Montana, and I have been much interested in the development of his ideas; but it has occurred to me frequently, as I listened to him, to ask What money is he seeking to protect against this appropriation bill?

Mr. DIXON. What I am trying to do is to call the attention of the Senate, and I hope of the thinking men of the country, that these great appropriation bills ought not to be snapped in shotgun fire, as they are at this time, but ought to be concentrated on some definite line of future action with regard to great naval bases and navy-yards.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was in my mind to ask the Senator, as I suggested, What money of the people is he seeking to protect against expenditure?

Mr. DIXON. The only money of the people that I know anything about is that in the vaults of the United States Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is to be paid to the American people, is it not?

Mr. DIXON. I presume it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there anything that enters into the construction of these battle ships and these navy-yards, or the things pertaining to them, that is not of American product?

Mr. DIXON. I hope not. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does not this expenditure simply stimulate productive industry in almost all its branches in the United States?

Mr. DIXON. Now, carrying that theory to its ultimate conclusion, you can ask the Treasury at any time to put men to work throwing dirt into one pile and throwing it back again. I think that is not fair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think the Senator from Montana would like to read that answer in cold print, because it is merely an evasion. I was speaking of a practical proposition to expend about $140,000,000 of the people's money by paying it to the people and receiving something for it.

Mr. DIXON. That is the reason I want to say what I am going to say at this time, and I want the Senator from Idaho to listen to it.

On May 9, 1906, GEORGE A. LOUD, of the House Naval Committee, presented to Congress a report showing that at the Boston Navy-Yard out of its total product of $925,000 there was a loss of $325,000 over the cost of the same articles at ruling commercial prices.

Getting back to the manufacture of boats, which, they tell me, goes on upon an extensive scale at the Portsmouth Navy-Yard, they say:

> Almost all navy-yards now manufacture small boats of some kind. In one of the yards examined by Mr. Mudd a simple 14-foot punt cost $63.73; in another yard the same article cost $95.12. A 16-foot dingey cost $104.17 at one yard and $196.34 at another. And a 30-foot steam cutter varied from $1,890.63 to $2,684.62. Common boat rudders ran from $6 to $10; plain chopping blocks from $3 at one yard to $25 at another.

I am trying to convince the Members of the Senate as to the ultimate wastefulness of this kind of appropriations.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does not that amount only to an impeachment of the efficiency of the judgment of the executive officers of the Government? How does it enter into the question now under consideration?

Mr. DIXON. Simply in this way: We build great plants costing millions of dollars to produce a minimum of work, where if it was all done in four or five or six places it would be done for a half or a third of the cost.

Mr. President, I have said about all I intend to say about this bill. In conclusion, I want to say this to the Senate, and I think it is worth listening to, gentlemen.

The naval appropriation bill, which carries $137,000,000 this year, has grown from $13,000,000 in a little over twenty years, and the only way you can comprehend the figure is to use a yardstick of some kind. I started to try yesterday to get some kind of a yardstick that will impress upon our minds the enormous and overwhelming appropriations that we are putting into this naval bill every year.

Take the great State of Maine. I tried to get the total value of the assessed property, but could not get it. The total value of all her farm lands, with improvements, buildings, implements, machinery, and live stock, according to the last census, was $122,000,000—$15,000,000 less than we vote in this one year's naval appropriation bill.

Take the great State of Alabama. Her farm land, with improvements, buildings, implements, and machinery, and live stock together, amounted to $179,000,000—$12,000,000 less than the newspaper reports of what the chairman of the committee stated would be the amount of the naval appropriation bill within less than three years.

Take the great State of Florida. The total value of her farm lands and improvements and implements and machinery and live stock was $53,000,000—a little over a third of what we are pouring into the capacious hopper of the naval appropriations every year.

Take the great State of New Hampshire. The whole value of her farm lands and improvements and implements and machinery and live stock was $85,000,000—$50,000,000 less than this one naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator state the value of her manufactured products and make the comparison in that way?

Mr. DIXON. I do not have it here. I sent to the Library to get the total assessed value of States, and they said this is the only thing they could find.

Take the great State of North Carolina—I am reading from the Statistical Abstract of 1905, the last report. It shows that her entire farm lands with improvements, buildings, machinery, and live stock amounted to only $233,000,000, less than two years' naval appropriations, and within three years one naval appropriation bill would practically swallow the entire assessed valuation of North Carolina's farms, live stock, and machinery.

One hundred and fifty-three million dollars is the total assessment of farms, live stock, and machinery in South Carolina.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that this bill is going to pass, probably letter for letter and item for item. Of course when the chairman of the Naval Committee says he will test the feeling of the Senate on this matter, I think the chairman in all fairness knows we do not test the feeling of the Senate on these naval appropriations when you say they are going to pass.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. In the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have concluded all that I wanted to say about this matter. I repeat that it has not been done in any filibustering spirit. It has been done because I do not believe we stop to see where we are drifting, and God knows there ought to be some plan of some kind somewhere to put some possible check on this geometric progression, this ratio of increase in the appropriations for the naval establishment, and especially at a time, as I said, when we are confronted by $150,000,000 of deficit for the present year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 26, line 13, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty thousand" and insert "seventy-six thousand three hundred and thirty;" and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "sixty-six thousand" and insert "ninety-two thousand three hundred and thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, New York, N. Y.: Central power plant, to complete, $116,000; granite and concrete dry dock, to continue, $200,000; toward improvement of water-front facilities, $76,330; in all, navy-yard, New York, N. Y., $392,330.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 21, after the word "dollars," to insert "paving around piers, $50,000;" and in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventeen" and insert "sixty-seven," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Philadelphia, Pa.: Central power plant, to complete, $172,600; dredging, cost not to exceed $430,000, $215,000; crane track, extensions, $30,000; paving around piers, $50,000; in all, navy-yard, Philadelphia, $467,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Provided, That hereafter the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to maintain its track connection with the United States Navy-Yard in the city of Washington, D. C., by means of a single track on K street and Canal street SE., either as at present located or as the same may hereafter be relocated, in whole or in part, with the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and to continue the operation thereof, anything contained in any prior act or acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

So as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Washington, D. C.: Improvements to storehouse for guns and mounts, $7,000; concrete roof for foundry building, $15,000; improvements to building 118, $3,000; improvements to building 41, $20,000; fireproof storehouse for fuses, acids, and oils, $15,000; in all, $60,000: Provided, That hereafter the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company be, etc.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I want to make a point of order against this amendment. It is general legislation.

Mr. HALE. It is undoubtedly subject to the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it is clearly in contravention of the rule, and sustains the point of order that it is general legislation.

The next amendment was, on page 28, after line 2, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to investigate the question of acquiring all or a part of the land of the Jamestown Exposition Company near the Norfolk Navy-Yard, with the view to establishing thereon a naval training station, said investigation to include the question of value, adaptability, desirability, or necessity for the efficiency of the naval service and the terms on which the property can be acquired, and report to Congress with such recommendations as to him may seem best.

Mr. BURKETT. I want to make a point of order against that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the ground of the point of order?

Mr. BURKETT. That it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken and sustains the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the bill is full of provisions of this sort. I do not want to make points of order against like provisions, but I hope the Senator will not insist on the point of order. If he had investigated this matter I am sure he would not pick out this item and discriminate against it. The bill is full of such provisions all through, and I have not made the point of order against them, and it is not customary in the consideration of the appropriation bills. It is the custom and, perhaps, absolutely necessary that these provisions shall be inserted.

This is an exceedingly important provision. It is simply for an investigation, and I hope very much that the Senator will not insist upon the point of order.

I do not wish to take time to go into an explanation of the amendment. The time is very precious, and yet I am sure if the Senator understood it he would not object to an investigation of a matter of vital importance to the naval service. I hope very much that the Senator will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator I regret always to make any point of order, and I have not taken it upon myself to make points of order against anything for any other purpose than when I thought it was really for the welfare of legislation.

I raised one point of order on the page before because it was legislation that the committee of which I am a member had spent considerable time in thrashing out at several hearings and had decided on a certain kind of legislation. I thought I understood something about that matter, and I raised a point of order on it, thinking that it was not proper in this bill.

This immediate item, I will say, I think we all know sufficiently about to warrant the raising of a point of order. I have my own opinion with reference to the taking over of this exposition land. If the Senate, at a proper time and on a proper bill, should come in and do it, I could certainly have nothing to say. I should vote against it if it did not present itself favorably to my mind. But here it is proposed to put it on an appropriation bill at a time when we do not want to discuss it. I am sure the committee does not want to have time taken in the discussion of the merits pro and con, and it seemed to me the best way out and the proper thing to do was to raise the point of order and keep out the discussion rather than to discuss it here.

I do not want to sit still as a Member and not have the matter discussed at some length. I should not want to see it go through without its being discussed at some length. I do not want to see it get started. I know it is just an investigation, but all these great propositions start with simply investigating a little something or other and then it goes along.

I do not want to take up time. I think this kind of legislation ought to come in on a bill at a time when we can discuss it, when there will be full opportunity to debate it.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do not feel like withdrawing the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, this is a peculiar situation. This property is in the hands of receivers and the assets of the exposition company are being administered. The Government has erected at this property a permanent pier at a cost of half a million dollars. The Government loaned the company a million dollars. This is simply giving an opportunity for an investigation to see if anything can be saved to the Government as well as to see whether this will not be an important acquisition to the efficiency of the naval service.

It is simply an investigation. As I said, I dislike to take time to go at any length into it; but it is a peculiar case. If anything is done, it can be done in the immediate future, because this property will go on the market under a decree of the United States court for the eastern district of Virginia. The company is insolvent and its assets are in the course of administration. The amendment simply proposes an investigation to see what can be done to save the Government something in connection with the exposition there. As I said, among other things, it has expended half a million dollars on a permanent pier. That will be entirely lost to the Government unless it acquires this property.

It does seem to me the Senator from Nebraska might withdraw his point of order, as the amendment is simply for the purpose of an investigation. The merits of the question can be discussed when it comes before the Senate with the light thrown on it by a report from the Navy Department.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to ask the Senator a question. I thought I understood it, but I may not. There is no appropriation in this proposed investigation; no money is to be spent? The Navy Department does it with its own instrumentality?

Mr. MARTIN. There is not one single dollar of expenditure contemplated in it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It does not commit Congress to the purchase of this land; it is merely to get information?

Mr. MARTIN. That is all; nothing else whatever.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, there is not anything required in this amendment that the Senator does not know all about now, that the Navy Department does not know all about, that the Treasury Department does not know all about. It simply starts out to commit the Senate to a certain proposition. For one I am not going to sit here and permit it.

Mr. MARTIN. The Senator is very much mistaken. There is a great deal that I do not know about it. I am not in a position to know as to its adaptability and as to its necessity for the efficiency of the service, nor am I informed as to its value. I do not know what price the Government can afford to pay for it. It needs investigation, careful business investigation, and that is all that is provided for here. Congress is absolutely free to do as it may see fit when the report comes in. If an adverse report comes in that of necessity would end the whole matter, but if the Navy Department makes a favorable report it would still remain for Congress after a discussion of the matter to determine whether it would adopt any recommendation made by the Navy Department.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, for the present I will have to accept the situation, though I shall look over the bill. If this rule is to apply, I want it to be applied throughout the bill. I am not disposed to let the bill stand bristling full of new legislation and have this most meritorious and harmless provision go out on a point of order. If such a rule is to be enforced here, I will not act hastily, but I will look over the bill. I will not say positively that I will call into requisition the same rule throughout the bill, though I am strongly inclined to think the bill is full of legislative enactments from one end of it to the other, and if this rule is to be applied let the bill be cleansed in every part of it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I sympathize very much with the Senator from Virginia on this amendment, but I wish to say to him that I think he is wrong in saying that the bill is full of legislative propositions. There are a few, but not many. I hope the Senator will consider each one as it is reached on its own merits. Two or three matters have come up already where the point of order was clear and plain, and I have not asked to consume any time. I have said I agreed that the point of order was well taken, and I propose to do that hereafter. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in debating or defending provisions that are clearly subject to the point of order. I hope the Senator will let all those stand until they are reached, and will let each one stand on its own merits.

Mr. MARTIN. As I understand, Mr. President, this point of order can be made when the bill is in the Senate as well as when it is in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. MARTIN. I will examine the bill. I have no desire—therefore I spoke with as much caution as I did—to antagonize a useful provision because of what I consider a very great injustice to my State in this matter; yet I feel very reluctant to see a rule applied in one case which is not applied generally. I said the bill was bristling with such instances. I have seen a number of cases. There was one just passed over in relation to the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railway Company, which required them to keep a track to the navy-yard.

Mr. CLAY. That went out.

Mr. TILLMAN. It ought not to have gone out.

Mr. MARTIN. It ought not to have gone out. It is a meritorious provision, and it ought to be in the bill. I knew it was subject to the same point of order as this, but I did not know that this point of order had been made.

Mr. HALE. Yes; a point of order was made, and it went out.

Mr. MARTIN. There are a great number of others, but, as I just now said, for the present I will waive the point of order. I will simply throw out the suggestion, for I am going to examine the bill in that connection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 28, line 13, before the word "paving," to strike out "Sewer system, extension, $5,000;" in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" in line 15, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" in line 17, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ten thousand" and insert "thirty thousand five hundred;" in the same line, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" in line 18, after the word "dollars," to insert "increasing and improving torpedo-boat slips, $50,000;" in line 20, after the word "dollars," to strike out "crane track, extension, $25,000;" and in line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "ninety-five thousand" and insert "one hundred and thirty-five thousand five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Charleston, S. C.: Paving and grading (to continue), $20,000; underground conduit system, extension, $5,000; intercepting drain, $30,500; pneumatic system, extension, $5,000; dredging, to continue, $25,000; increasing and improving torpedo-boat slips, $50,000; in all, navy-yard, Charleston, S. C., $135,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 25, after the word "dollars," to insert "to repair rifle range and wharf, $5,000;" and on page 29, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Pensacola, Fla.: Remodeling building No. 29, $15,000; to repair rifle range and wharf, $5,000; in all, navy-yard, Pensacola, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 5, after the word "dollars," to insert "to complete marine railway, $15,000;" and in line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty-five," so as to make the clause read:

Naval station, Key West, Fla.: Latrines, $5,000; concrete cistern, $25,000; to complete marine railway, $15,000; in all, $45,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 15, after the word "doliars," to insert "to continue improvement of channel, $100,000; ordnance stores, $100,000; improvements to building No. 69, $4,000; railroad system, extension, $20,000;" and in line 21, before the word "five," to strike out "three hundred and forty-eight thousand" and insert "five hundred and seventy-two thousand," so as to make the clause read:

Navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal.: Central power plant at Mare Island Navy-Yard, Cal., to complete, $255,000; new elevators in buildings Nos. 69 and 71, $5,000; sewer system, extension, $10,000; repairs to building No. 116, $3,500; crane track, extension, $75,000; to continue improvement of channel, $100,000; ordnance stores, $100,000; improvements to building No. 69, $4,000; railroad system, extension, $20,000; in all, navy-yard, Mare Island, $572,500.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in view of the article that has been read by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] relating to Mare Island and various other navy-yards, I desire to have printed in the RECORD statements compiled from reports of the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, and the chiefs of other bureaus. To save the time of the Senate, and as bearing on the question, I ask to have the papers which I send to the desk inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

August 31, 1852, Congress appropriated $100,000 for the purpose of a navy-yard in the Bay of San Francisco or neighboring waters, and the Secretary of the Navy was directed to select a site. Secretary of the Navy Graham, January 15, 1852, ordered the appointment of a board to select the site for this yard, and Commodore Sloat, Commander Ringgold, and Lieutenant Blunt were designated. The orders were to keep in view, in making the selection, security from attack and facilities for defense; security from violent winds and sea and safe anchorage in adjacent waters; adaptation for the construction of permanent stone docks; facilities for procuring, housing, and boarding workmen of various classes; for procuring materials and stores; and for the erection of the necessary buildings. The board was also directed to ascertain to what extent the Toredo limnoria injures piling or other wood structures beneath low water. Unfortunately, the report of the Sloat board can not be found in the archives of the Navy Department, but Secretary Thompson refers to it in a communication to Congress, stating that the board made a very careful examination of the points supposed to possess the requisite advantages for a naval station, and after mature deliberation came to the conclusion that Mare Island has the most eligible and advantageous position that could be found in the waters of the Bay of San Francisco and its adjacent waters for naval purposes, and thus reported accordingly: "Commodore Sloat, in a letter written from Mare Island Straits in 1852, states that the board had, after careful consideration, come to the conclusion that Mare Island is by far the most eligible location for that purpose in these waters."

The Commission on Navy-Yards reported, on December 1, 1883, regarding the advantages of the Mare Island Navy-Yard, that "its approaches may be successfully defended against the attacks of a powerful enemy. It is far enough removed from the sea to be beyond the reach of guns of the longest range or any possibility of being captured by a coup de main, and yet not so far as to make it difficult of access. The adjacent harbor is good and perfectly secure in all weathers. Its channel is deep and never obstructed by ice. The climate is even and salubrious the year round and suitable for outdoor work. The yard is convenient to the railroad communications which center on the opposite shore of Napa Straits and on the shores of the Strait of Karquines, about a mile distant. The depth of water abreast the yard front averages 28 feet at mean low tide and abreast commission rock, an obstruction that can be easily removed at small expense.

Thus was the Mare Island Navy-Yard established after an impartial investigation and study of all the conditions to be taken into account in the location of a navy-yard on the Pacific coast, and in the years since then a great repair and construction plant has been installed and dry docks built—one of the largest in the entire country now about completed. As the work of the yard increased and the draft of vessels became greater more attention was paid to the depth of water from San Francisco to the yard.

The depth of the water at the entrance of San Francisco Bay is 33 feet over the bar by main channel at low tide, while by the Bonita channel it is very much deeper. The area of the waters of the bay, including San Pablo Bay, is 399 square miles. Its length from Dumbarton Point, near the southern extremity, to Napa Slough, the northern extremity, is 47⅛ miles, and to Karquines Strait 52¼ miles. Its greatest width is 12⅛ miles, and its narrowest place, from Point San Pablo, 1⅛ miles.

The extreme length of Mare Island, including a large tract of tule land on the northern side and extending toward Napa and Sonoma, is about 10 miles, and its average width, including tule land, about three-quarters of a mile.

The area of upland is 741 acres, and of the tule lands on the east side, which will be available for yard purposes, is 135 acres.

No accurate measurement has been made of the area of the tule on the northern side, but an approximate area is 3,973 acres. Its shore at the southern end is precipitous and the land high, the highest point being about 300 feet above high tide.

Between San Francisco and Mare Island is Pinole Shoal. It begins about 2½ miles south of Mare Island Strait, and between this northern extremity of the shoal and Mare Island there is naturally 30 feet of water or over. This depth is carried to Carquinez Strait, which has from 48 to 60 feet of water. Along both sides of Carquinez Strait are grain warehouses, where is stored and whence is shipped all the grain from the great Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, which require a large fleet of the largest deep-water ships each year to transport it to foreign countries. There are also smelting works, sugar refineries, lumber yards, oil-distribution tanks that have many hundred miles of pipe line, depots for produce of all kinds, and many manufactories, all of which selected this point because of the facilities offered for shipment by sea to all ports of the world by the largest steam and sail vessels which ply in foreign trade. The vessels employed in the carrying trade, provided by these great industries, are of draft equal to that of our greatest battle ships, and the channel across the shoals must be kept open for them without reference to the needs of the Mare Island yard. There is an immense carrying trade by water with points on the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, averaging 425,000 tons of freight for the former and 736,000 for the latter for 1907, valued at $25,000,000. All this must be carried to San Francisco or to sea by way of Pinole Shoal, and its channel must therefore be kept at a proper depth for the water-borne commerce of the great valleys of the State. Pinole Shoal extends about 27,000 feet south from the northern extremity referred to above. It is formed undoubtedly from the débris brought down from the mines in the days of hydraulic mining, and is kept up at present from the wash of cultivated fields in the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys. But this present wash from cultivated lands is by far less than that which came from the mines, and the shoaling caused by it is by no means that which gave rise to the shoal in the first place.

The Government will keep open the channel across this shoal for the use of the seagoing ships of the merchant service, and need not be considered in connection with the cost of improving the navigation of Mare Island and maintain the depth of water there and in the yard basin. The board recently appointed to study the hydraulics of Mare Island Navy-Yard states that the natural channel from the entrance of San Francisco Bay to the shoal has not practically changed since 1863, but that it is evident that the dredged channel across the shoal must be redredged and a protecting dike built, or periodical redredging resorted to. The estimated cost of a dike is about $1,000,000. But the board does not favor the construction of a dike at once, believing that there is a chance that the redredging of the channel will so remove the soft material in the vicinity that the depth may be maintained with a comparatively small amount of dredging, which would be inexpensive if the Government should build and operate a first-class dredging machine. Moreover, the dike which it suggested be built southerly from the southern extremity of Mare Island will, it is hoped, so influence the current as to contribute to the scouring and thus to the maintenance of the required depth in the channel across the shoal.

Even with the present depth of water, which the board which examined the question last year states is about 23 feet over Pinole Shoal at low water with 6 or 8 feet tide, the navy-yard at Mare Island could undoubtedly be now used by every vessel of the navy now afloat. During the past year two armored cruisers, each drawing 25 feet of water, went up through San Pablo Bay to Mare Island. Of the 31 battle ships constructed or authorized, only four have as great a draft as the Tennessee and Washington, referred to. Only two draw 24 feet 8 inches; eight, 24 feet 6 inches; four, 24 feet; one, 23 feet 11 inches; one, 23 feet 10 inches; five, 23 feet 9 inches; one, 23 feet 7 inches; five, 23 feet 6 inches. The four big-gun battle ships of 20,000 and 22,000 tons will draw when in commission 26 feet 11 inches and 28 feet 6 inches, respectively. It appears, therefore, that of the battle ships built or building only these last four have a greater draft than the two armored cruisers which went up to Mare Island last summer. Three battle ships visited the yard last year, namely, the Alabama, drawing 23 feet 6 inches; the Maine, 23 feet 10 inches; and the Missouri, 23 feet 11 inches.

There also went to the yard the armored cruisers Maryland, Colorado, California, South Dakota, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, drawing 24 feet 1 inch, each of these drawing more water than seventeen of our first-class battle ships. Besides this, there were four protected cruisers that went to the yard, the Charleston, Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Louis; four third-class cruisers, besides three supply ships, hospital ships, and smaller craft, such as coast-defense vessels, gunboats, etc. It is worthy of note, too, that the supply ship Glacier draws 25 feet 4 inches. There is no doubt whatever that if there had been a large enough force at the Mare Island yard most, if not all of the battle ships of the Atlantic Fleet which needed repairs could have had these repairs made at that yard, and that they would have found no difficulty in getting there, for the largest vessels of this fleet draw 6 inches less water than the Tennessee and Washington, which found no difficulty in passing Pinole Shoal.

That the Mare Island yard is efficient and is doing good work is evidenced from the reports of the different bureaus. In the Department of Construction and Repair there were employed in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, a maximum of 1,623 men, the minimum being 831. Vessels receiving minor repairs number 48; important repairs, 16; craft built or building, 37, including a collier of 12,585 tons, drawing 26 feet, and another of a higher class of capacity and speed is authorized; there were 50 vessels dry-docked during the year, and the expenditure for labor on this account was $625,152.

In the Steam Engineering Department 63 vessels had their machinery repaired at a cost of $358,059, and new machinery installed at a cost of $136,504. The cost of making stores for issue to ships was $112,468. The total cost of labor for this department of the yard was $537,022, and of material, $388,642. Over $100,000 was expended in improvement to the plant.

The Equipment Department expended $196,136 for labor and $143,464 for material.

The Department of Yards and Docks spent $563,381 for public works of a permanent character, $41,914 for repairs and preservation, $126,601 for maintenance, $16,820 for contingent expenses, and $15,177 for the civil establishment, a total of $763,894. The present value of permanent structures is $4,358,350.

The Ordnance Department prosecuted work on 47 vessels, completing the outfits of the California and South Dakota, and doing much work on the New Orleans and Wyoming. Fire-control instruments were installed on 4 vessels, and a complete target plant was made for the Pacific and Atlantic fleets. Ammunition was prepared for 47 war vessels.

There is at Mare Island a granite dock 27 feet 5 inches over the sills, capable of docking any vessel we now have afloat, and another granite dock is nearing completion having a depth of 31 feet 5 inches on the sills.

It is thus demonstrated that we have at Mare Island a navy-yard very efficient in character, capable of not only repairing and equipping battle ships and all other naval vessels, but able to do construction work of the highest character, and that even as the channels exists today, it is undoubtedly capable of taking care of any of our naval vessels now afloat.

As to its situation, Read-Admiral Hollyday said before the House Committee on Naval Affairs:

"It could not be better located. The enemy could take San Francisco, and still they would not get Mare Island Navy-Yard; and the climate is superb, a great deal better than San Francisco. It is out of the trade winds, and you can work there every day in the year. It is never very hot and never very cold, and there is a fine labor market—a navy-yard town of almost 6,000 inhabitants. Almost every man is interested in the navy-yard one way or another, and they are fine mechanics. They draw from San Francisco in addition, and they have a boat train service almost every hour."

The matter of climate is an important one, for it is a complete offset, as has been acknowledged by naval observers, against the longer hours and fewer holidays of workmen in private yards in the East, making the Mare Island workmen as cheap as any to be found in the United States. And construction in the yard should be continued, to carry out the idea of the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, who in his report in 1906 said:

"As stated in previous communications, it is believed that at least one yard on the Atlantic coast and one yard on the Pacific coast should, when practicable, be given a reasonable proportion of new construction work, in order that such yards, one of which on each coast is now suitably equipped, may always be available for any work the Government may desire undertaken therein.

"One of the specially advantageous features of such new construction is the availability at any time of men employed in such work for service in connection with emergency or periodical repairs to the fleet."

One of the peculiar advantages of the yard is that the water there has such an admixture of fresh water that it kills the barnacles on the vessels' bottoms, which are cleaned by simply anchoring them in the basin. The toredo and limoria also can not exist in these waters, and pile construction is therefore protected against their attack. There are piles standing at the yard that are still sound, though they were driven thirty or forty years ago.

Such being the character of the Mare Island Navy-Yard and its approaches, it is evident that the Government should spare no pains to make it the principal naval base of the Pacific. It is also evident that comparatively little work would deepen the channels so that the large battle ships that we are now constructing can enter there. The Navy Department has therefore given this latter subject its attention.

In March, 1908, the Secretary of the Navy recommended that a board be appointed to consider the question of hydraulics at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, with the view to recommend a system of works which would secure and maintain a depth of water in the approaches to the yard and in the yard itself sufficient for the passage and handling of the largest battle ships built or contemplated. The board appointed consisted of Lieut. Col. John Biddle, Engineer Corps, U. S. Army; F. T. Chambers, civil engineer, U. S. Navy; Capt. Thomas H. Jackson, Engineer Corps, U. S. Army; J. V. Rockwell, civil engineer, U. S. Navy.

In considering the problem the board assumed 30 feet at mean low water from the entrance of San Francisco Bay to the end of the present sea wall at the upper end of Mare Island as the least depth which would provide a proper channel for the largest naval vessels. This would give at high tide from 36 to 38 feet, providing for any probable case of damaged ships. The new dock at the navy-yard will have a depth over sill of 31½ feet at mean high water. Thus the conditions would be perfect for the handling of the largest vessels we are ever likely to build.

The board found that this minimum depth of 30 feet at low water now exists naturally from San Francisco to the navy-yard, with the exception of a short stretch over Pinole Shoals in San Pablo Bay and in Mare Island Strait. In 1851, when the first survey was made, the least depth of water in Mare Island Strait was 27 feet at mean low water, and there was no sign of a bar at the entrance. In 1876 a bar had appeared at the entrance, due, probably, to the débris coming down from the hydraulic mines and to the wash from cultivated lands, and in 1896–1898 the depth of water had diminished to 21 feet over the bar and 15 feet for the inner channel. Dredging was then begun, and the inner channel was given a depth of 28 feet, and in 1899 the bar was dredged to 30 feet at mean low water. From that time there was some filling in from sediment deposited, in some sections very slight and in others as much as 2 feet per year. A system of dikes was then proposed and works constructed, which began to take effect in 1905, since which time they have contributed to regulate the channel, whose depth has been maintained since that date. Additions to the dike system are, however, necessary in order to secure the full effect designed. The typical sections have not only maintained themselves, but there has been a scouring of the channel, especially at its shallowest parts. The shallowest water is over the bar, but even here the depth has increased several inches; and when one of the dikes is extended, as contemplated in the original plans, the conditions will be still further improved. It is believed that the present tendency to shoal is due to the wash from cultivated lands, carried down the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, but that the principal cause is the silt stirred up by the waves in San Pablo Bay and carried north by the tides, to be deposited in the strait and channel at slack water; also from the silt coming down the Napa River, which flows by the yard. The mud from San Pablo Bay, however, is believed to be the source of shoaling that will have to be particularly guarded against.

The board discusses seven methods of dealing with the conditions at the yard.

The first is constant dredging to maintain the depths.

The second is the extension of the dike system, with the expectation that the dikes will render still further service to scour the channel, though it is not thought that this means would alone secure the desired depth.

The third is dredging the channel to 30 feet and extending the dikes within the strait and from the southern part of Mare Island 8,000 feet to prevent silt being carried into the strait from San Pablo Bay. It is expected that the scour will maintain the depths in this 400 and 600 foot channel with very little dredging; but in the 1,000-foot basin periodic dredging will be necessary, which would cost comparatively little with a dredge owned by the Government. The estimated expense of this improvement is $1,007,000, with an annual expenditure of $70,000 for maintenance of dikes and dredging. If Commission Rock is not removed, the cost will be $112,000 less, or $895,000.

The fourth plan is the diversion of Napa River to the west of Mare Island and the construction of a dam across the strait at the upper end, making an open tidal basin at the yard. The advantage of this plan would be to have a basin with no current, which would facilitate handling vessels. The disadvantages are the probable greater silting of the basin and approaches and greater cost, which is placed at $1,553,000, with $134,000 annual cost of maintenance.

The fifth plan is to construct a dam, with lock and sluice gates, across the upper limit of the yard, to confine the waters of the Napa River until low tide, when the sluice could be opened and the outgoing water scour the channel. This would expose shipping to great danger and is not considered advisable.

The sixth plan is to construct a dam and sluice gates across the mouth of Mare Island strait. This, also, is not viewed favorably.

The seventh plan is to construct a dam at the upper limit of the yard and another at the entrance to the strait, with sluices and locks for the passage of vessels. This involves the inconvenience to Vallejo business involved in the former plan, but keeps out the silt coming from Napa River. A large gate could be substituted for locks in the dam at the entrance of the strait, to be operated at slack water, but the board prefers two locks. The estimates for this plan are $5,247,000, with $25,000 per year for maintenance.

Should the third or fourth plan prove unsatisfactory after trial, this last plan would still be open for adoption.

In San Pablo Bay there has been practically no shoaling in the deeper parts since 1863. In 1905 a channel 300 feet wide and 30 feet deep was dredged across Pinole Shoal, but this gradually filled in so that the board's soundings showed available depth at low water of about 23 feet. Observation showed that the currents in San Pablo Bay were not parallel to the channel, and, moreover, vary with tide and wind. The material of the bottom is soft mud, easily dredged. This channel must be redredged, and there must be a protecting dike or periodical redredging. A dike along the dredged portion would be about 30,000 feet long and would cost about $1,500,000. The objection would be, besides its cost, uncertainty as to what locations a channel would assume with reference to the dike and the interference with the tidal basin. Its advantage would be protection from cross currents, production of additional scour, and further protection of Mare Island Strait from silt.

The board believes that at some future time a dike on one or both sides of the channel will be necessary, but at present does not deem construction advisable, for the reasons that the possibility of keeping the channel open by dredging is worth a trial.

The board, therefore, recommends as follows:

"That Mare Island Strait be dredged to a 30-foot depth with a width of 600 feet over the bar and up to the turn, a width of 400 feet from the turn to the receiving wharf, and 1,000 feet from that point to the north end of the quay wall; that the dikes within the strait and at the lower end of Mare Island be extended as shown in plan, and that the channel in San Pablo Bay be dredged to a width of 500 feet and depth of 30 feet, all depths being at mean low water.

"The board strongly recommends the immediate construction by the United States of a self-contained and self-propelling dredge. This would be used for maintenance and would soon pay for itself. The main objects are to have one immediately available for dredging shoal places and to decrease the cost of maintenance. The board's estimate, including the cost of this dredge, is $1,767,000, and of maintenance, $125,000 per annum. This estimate for maintenance is based on the assumption of a dredge constructed and operated by the Government and is therefore less (by $50,000) than the estimates for maintenance in the main body of the report. The expenditure for maintenance is, in the opinion of the board, absolutely necessary to preserve the approaches so as to permit naval vessels of deepest draft to reach Mare Island."

The Secretary or the Navy, in order to increase efficiency and economy in the work at navy-yards, is hereby authorized and directed to consolidate into one department at each yard and station all manufacture and repair work, except the work involved in the handling of stores, the manufacture of clothing, and the preparation and handling of provisions; and he is hereby authorized to incorporate such portions of the appropriations herein or previously made which are chargeable with labor and material into a single account, to be called "The Manufacture and Repair Account," and he may pay from the sum so segregated for all labor at the yards and stations and for all material used in manufactures and repairs: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as altering or suspending the specific objects for which the appropriations in question are made: Provided further, That all expenditures under "The Manufacture and Repair Account" shall be reported in detail to Congress on or before January 1, 1911.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, there are a good many reasons why this provision ought not to go into the bill; but rather than take time to explain my objections to it, I simply make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALDRICH. General legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. General legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the provision proposes general legislation, and he therefore sustains the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. HALE. I offer as a substitute for that amendment what I send to the desk. It perfects the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment just read it is proposed to insert:

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 42, after line 5, insert:

The Surgeon-General of the Navy, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, is hereby authorized to employ dental surgeons to serve the officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, not to exceed 15 in all; they shall be employed as contract dental surgeons, and shall be graduates of standard dental colleges, trained in the several branches of dentistry, within the age limits of 24 and 35 years; they shall be of good moral and professional character, and shall pass a satisfactory physical and professional examination, and shall receive the same compensation as acting assistant surgeons in the navy: Provided, That two of the number of dental surgeons to be appointed shall be first appointed by the Surgeon-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, with reference to their fitness for assignment, under the direction of the Surgeon-General, to the special service of conducting the examinations and supervising the operations of the others, and for such special service an extra compensation of $60 a month will be allowed: Provided further, That the dentist now employed at the Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the operation of this act.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, bills are pending in regard to a dental corps both for the army and the navy. There is a House bill in reference to the navy, and there is a bill before the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to dentists for the army. It is an important question, and there is considerable difference of opinion as to the proper method to take in dealing with this corps. It seems to me that it is rather too large a subject to handle in an amendment to an appropriation bill. I do not want to delay the bill a moment by debating the subject, so I make the point of order that the amendment proposes general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the point is well taken, and sustains the point of order.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," on page 44, line 17, after the word "all," to strike out "six million eight hundred and one thousand five hundred and twenty-three dollars and fifty-one" and insert "seven million one hundred and ten thousand two hundred and eighty-four dollars and thirty-one," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $7,110,284.31.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read to the end of line 6, on page 45.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I find it impossible to follow the Secretary's reading, because of his omissions. I do not make this suggestion to delay the consideration of the bill, but I want an opportunity to follow it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

Construction and repair of vessels: For preservation and completion of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; steam steerers, pneumatic steerers, steam capstans, steam windlasses, and all other auxiliaries; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; purchase of machinery and tools for use in shops; carrying on work of experimental model tank; designing naval vessels; construction and repair of yard craft, lighters, and barges; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat; general care, increase, and protection of the navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses for vessels and navy-yards, inspectors' offices, such as photographing, books, professional magazines, plans, stationery, and instruments for drafting room, and for pay of classified force under the bureau, $8,979,144: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repair of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 10 per cent of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repair of any other ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the Secretary of the Navy of the authority to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home. And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to make expenditures from appropriate funds under the various bureaus for repairs and changes on the vessels herein named in an amount not to exceed the sum specified for each vessel, respectively, as follows: Maine (in addition to the $200,000 authorized by the naval appropriation act approved May 13, 1908), $520,000; Missouri, $540,000; Ohio, $540,000; Wisconsin, $380,000; Chattanooga, $210,000; Cleveland, $210,000; Denver, $210,000; Des Moines, $210,000; Galveston, $210,000; Tacoma, $210,000; Concord, $152,000; Yorktown, $152,000; Elcano, $35,000; Paragua, $20,000; Quiros, $30,500; Rodgers, $42,000; Rainbow, $140,000; Supply, $130,000; Yankee, $195,000; Apache, $21,500; Lincoln, $6,000; in all, $4,164,000, as per the letters of the Secretary of the Navy, House Documents Nos. 1152 and 1306, Sixtieth Congress, concerning repairs of certain naval vessels.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I notice this bill carries a little over $4,000,000 for repairs of our vessels. If I remember correctly, during the last session of Congress we appropriated $5,000,000 or a little over $5,000,000 for this purpose, naming the vessels that were to be repaired. I see that for the Brooklyn we appropriated $453,500. The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows that only $740.37 of that sum has been spent thus far in repairing that ship. For the San Francisco we appropriated $600,250, and the report of the Secretary shows that $3,565.17 has been spent for repairing that ship, which is only a small amount of the large appropriation we made. For the Baltimore we appropriated $653,300, and of that sum but $71,832.42 has been used. For the Alabama we appropriated $660,500, and only $1,165.68 of that sum has been used. We appropriated for the repair of the Iowa $559,500, and only $18,277.31 of that amount has been used. I will not go over all of these various amounts, because it would take time, and I know time is precious.

It appears that of the $5,000,000 we appropriated to repair these vessels last year only about one-twentieth of the amount has been utilized for that purpose. I see that the Secretary of the Navy reports as follows in answer to a resolution which I introduced:

The amount required to keep a first-class battle ship in repair and good condition for one year is $109,856.09.

If we had 30 battle ships, at that rate it would not require over $3,000,000 per year to keep them in repair, if the Secretary of the Navy is correct. I had an idea from the appropriations we made at the last session that it took from four to six hundred thousand dollars per year to keep a battle ship in repair. I should like to know what will be done with the $4,000,000 appropriated last year for the repair of these battle ships that has not been utilized. The Senator from Maine of course knows. It may be possible that this sum will be used between now and the 30th day of June. That appropriation bill passed last May, but the appropriations were not available until the 30th day of June. If the Secretary of the Navy is correct, and $109,856.09 will keep in repair and in good condition a battle ship for a year, I can not see why we appropriate five and six hundred thousand dollars per year to keep up a battle ship.

Mr. HALE. Of course, the money that we appropriate for repairs in such large sums can only be spent for repairs on those ships. It can not be diverted to any other purpose. It is for a specific purpose and does not lapse and return to the Treasury. The Senator will bear in mind, and we may as well realize, that the repairs upon all these ships appropriated for last year and this year and for next year will never be fully known until the fleet returns and is sent to the different navy-yards, and boards of examination and survey are called. Then the amounts of repairs and overhauling, in some cases amounting almost to rebuilding, will be known in the aggregate.

Some of these ships, repairs on which we appropriated for, were taken and sent off around the world. The money could not be expended upon them and will not be until they get back. In some cases there have been small repairs, but that does not in any way indicate that a big ship can be kept in commission for the small sums mentioned by the Senator as set forth in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy. The increase we will never know until the ships to be repaired under last year's and this year's appropriations get in and go to the navy-yards. We shall know better then what the entire bill is to be; but the department is not obliged to expend the appropriation in the year in which it is made.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator expects, then, that this balance of nearly $4,000,000, which has not been utilized, will be probably applied to repairing the battle ships when they return from the cruise around the world?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly; and a great deal more.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that in the next four months we could spend that much money in repairing these ships?

Mr. HALE. I do not know. They can expend a great deal in four or five months. They go right to work as soon as the ships come in. How much they will spend the rest of the year, I do not know. It will go over into next year.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator understand that a first-class battle ship can be kept in good condition and repair for $109,000, on an average, a year? I see the Secretary says so in his statement.

The amount required to keep a first-class battle ship in repair and good condition for one year is $109,856.09.

He goes on to say that he has made a calculation of the amount used heretofore, and considering the number of battle ships we have in use, I had an idea that in ten years it would take as much to repair and keep in good condition a battle ship as it would to construct it, and I was surprised when I found that it takes only $109,000 to keep it in good repair.

Mr. HALE. That is not in any way complete. That is all they have expended, but the rest of it will all go.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Maine can enlighten me and perhaps others on that point. I understand that the report of the Secretary simply means that if a ship is tied up in a yard, not used, no expenditure for fuel or anything except to maintain it in its condition, and possibly clean it if it needs cleaning during the year, by putting it in the dock, the ship can be maintained for that sum. A ship in commission can not be maintained for that sum; in other words, a ship that is running, that is being used, that is being worn out. It is simply a ship that is lying—as was illustrated twice yesterday and which we read long ago in Coleridge—a toy ship, not a usable ship.

As a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean—

Mr. HALE. I do not know that I quite get the inquiry. All this money is going to be spent in the navy-yards.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know, but I was speaking of the report of the Secretary of the Navy, made in reply to the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, which was that a first-class battle ship could be maintained without deterioration at $109,000, was it not?

Mr. CLAY. One hundred and nine thousand dollars.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say that must be for a ship that is not being used.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. I have here from the department a memorandum of what it costs to keep a ship afloat, one of these biggest ships, and it is $1,090,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the full complement of officers and men——

Mr. HALE. Everything.

Mr. TILLMAN. And fuel and food and supplies and powder and everything.

Mr. CLAY. That is not for the repairs of the ship. It includes much more than that.

Mr. HALE. That is the whole thing.

Mr. CLAY. The Secretary says he reaches this conclusion by taking the total amount that it cost to repair battle ships last year and dividing it by the number of battle ships we had on hand, and that the average was $109,856.09. Surely he did not mean ships at sea.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICK in the chair). The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 47, line 17, after the word "vessels," to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That hereafter it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereof a detailed statement showing the amount expended from each of the appropriations for the repair of every ship where such repairs exceed for any one ship the sum of $200,000 in any one fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 24, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eleven thousand nine hundred and sixty-eight" and insert "seventeen thousand four hundred and eighty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

Engineering experiment station, United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.—Experimental and research work: For original investigation and extended experimentation of naval appliances, and for the purchase of such machines and auxiliaries considered applicable for test and use in the naval service, $17,488.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 7, to insert:

The title of warrant machinist is hereby changed to machinist; and all machinists shall, after six years from date of warrant, be commissioned chief machinists, to rank with, but after, ensign, and shall, on promotion, have the same pay and allowances as are allowed chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, and chief sailmakers, and no machinist shall be promoted until he shall have passed such examination before a board as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, and no warrant officer, heretofore or hereafter promoted six years from date of warrant, shall suffer a reduction in pay which, but for such promotion, would have been received by him: Provided, That chief boatswains, chief gunners, and chief machinists shall be eligible for appointment to the grade of ensign under the restrictions imposed by law upon the appointment of boatswains, gunners, and warrant machinists to that grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, after line 15, to insert:

The crypt and window spaces of the United States Naval Academy chapel are to be used only for memorials to United States naval officers who have successfully commanded a fleet or squadron in battle, or who have received or may receive the thanks of the Congress of the United States for conspicuously distinguished services in time of war, and no memorial shall be accepted for or installed in said crypt or window spaces until at least five years after the death of the officer in question: Provided, That nothing in this provision shall be considered as invalidating any agreement made by the present or any former superintendent of the Naval Academy, authorizing a memorial window in the old Naval Academy shapel to be transferred to the new Naval Academy chapel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 6, after the word "dollars," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein made for the Marine Corps shall be expended for the purposes for which said appropriations are made unless officers and enlisted men shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships and armored cruisers, and also upon such other vessels of the navy as the President may direct, in detachments of not less than 8 per cent of the strength of the enlisted men of the navy on said vessels.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in my opinion this amendment is general legislation and is clearly subject to the point of order. But it is a very important matter, and I believe the Senator from Maine would like it discussed on its merits. So I shall not make any point of order, and will try to discuss it solely on its merits.

It is a very important change. It reverses the policy of the Government, as expressed in the statutes, from the beginning of the Government. The Revised Statutes, section 1611, provide:

The Marine Corps may be formed into as many companies or detachments as the President may direct, with a proper distribution of commissioned and noncommissioned officers and musicians to each company or detachment.

SEC. 1616. Marines may be detached for service on board the armed vessels of the United States, and the President may detach and appoint for service on said vessels such of the officers of the corps as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 1619. The Marine Corps shall be liable to do duty in the forts and garrisons of the United States.

It has been the uniform policy, therefore, of the Government to compel the employment of marines on shore in such detachments and at such places as the President may direct, but it has been left always within the discretion of the President whether they should be sent to sea at all, or in what number. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to take that power from the President, and to compel him to keep at least as many marines on the ships as are now serving in that capacity.

This proposed law will apply, of course, to the incoming President and not to the outgoing President. It will take from him the power which I think properly belongs to him as the Commander in Chief to send the marines to sea or to keep them on shore duty, and for the first time the President will be fettered in that direction. I think that is enough to indicate what a serious change is here involved.

Mr. President, we borrowed the Marine Corps from the English navy. The English navy is the only navy that employs marines afloat, and the number of marines in the English navy is proportionately about the same as in our own. But the English marines on their ships are, many of them, the servants of the officers and perform duties of that kind which are not demanded of our marines and would be resented if they were demanded. In the German navy there are three battalions of marines, but they are not employed afloat, the statement of the German officers being that their presence would injure the morale and the military efficiency of the blue jackets. The French also have a force of marine infantry, which is employed at naval stations and for expeditionary purposes under the control of the navy. There are no marines afloat in the French navy. There are no marines at all in the Russian or Japanese navy, and I think that in the other navies the same is true.

In our navy there are at sea only 22 per cent of the enlisted marines; only one-sixth of the officers were at sea—54 out of 333. There are 41 marine officers of and above the grade of major, and only 2 were at sea—5 per cent—1 major in each fleet. The great body of the Marine Corps, all the higher officers, are employed on shore duty. Of the 10,000 men, roughly speaking, 8,000 are employed on shore duty and are used for expeditionary purposes, and 2,000 are now on the ships.

The character of the seamen on the United States ships of war has greatly changed and improved in the last comparatively few years. Some years ago the seamen on board our men of war were largely foreigners. They were recruited in the great ports, and the navy took what it could get. It often got very poor material—men who were ready to take service on such a ship because they could not get good service in the merchant marine. They were picked up everywhere. I think—I am recalling the old debates—we had nearly 75 per cent foreigners. That has completely changed. The seamen of the navy to-day are Americans. A very large proportion of them are native born, but they are practically all American citizens. The recruiting has been extended from the sea ports to all parts of the country, with the result that they are now drawing many of their seamen from the interior of the United States, from the region of the Lakes, and from other States, and are getting a fine class of men.

The seamen resent the use of a police force. They believe, and I think with some reason, that they are just as able to maintain discipline as soldiers are able to maintain discipline in the army. I think it would be the testimony of every officer of the army that no greater mistake could be made than to have a privileged and differently uniformed corps that should act as the policemen of each regiment. The marine corps of England, which we have borrowed, is a relic of the days of the press gang, when the unwilling men were seized in the streets, delivered by the crimps, and thrust unwillingly and almost in a condition of mutiny into the ships. Conditions have completely changed from the days when a corps of marines on board ship to act as police was necessary.

I shall call attention in a moment to the testimony of the officers of the navy in that respect. I believe it makes against good discipline to keep them longer on the ships, in view of the great improvements that have occurred in the character of the American blue jackets.

Mr. President, this order was made by the President, who of course had to make the order, on the recommendation of the Navy Department. It did not originate with him. It was recommended two years ago by Admiral Converse, at that time head of the Bureau of Navigation, the bureau charged with the care of the personnel of the navy. It was repeated by the present head of the Bureau of Navigation, Admiral Pillsbury. I have here his letter recommending it. It was approved by the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Metcalf. It was submitted to the President, and he made the order advised by the department.

I will read the letter of Admiral Pillsbury to the President. He says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1908.

SIR: The bureau is of the opinion that the time has arrived when all marine detachments should be removed from United States naval vessels, substituting blue jackets in their stead.

The marines thus removed should be organized into regiments, battalions, and companies, and should be embarked or ready to embark in a suitable vessel, and should be attached to the fleets, thus forming part of the fighting force of the fleets directly under the control of the Commander in Chief.

Attention is invited to the fact that both blue jackets and marines are recruited with the same degree of care and from the same class of people. If anything, it may be said that the degree of intelligence, superiority of intellect, etc., is in favor of the blue jacket, for a large number of ratings in the navy are filled by skilled laborers. Under these circumstances it is apparent that one possesses no virtue or military qualification that is not possessed by the other.

The blue jackets of to-day are self-respecting, reliable, and trustworthy, and it is believed that no reason at the present time exists for having men from two separate, distinct corps wearing different uniforms in the organization of a ship.

Under the navy regulations the marine detachment is a distinct part of the complement of a ship and forms a division in the detail of the whole force for battle. They are drilled at and man a certain number of guns, but if called upon at any time to land as an expeditionary force they abandon the guns aboard ship and break up the organization, leaving a certain number of guns without crews.

While under the regulations the Bureau of Navigation fixes the complements of vessels in commission, the removal of marine guards involves a change of policy, and the bureau therefore recommends that authority be granted to change the complements of all ships on board of which marines are now stationed, substituting for them an equal number of blue jackets as soon as the latter may be enlisted in sufficient numbers to make this substitution.

On July 1 last there were 2,022 on board ships of the fleet. This does not include receiving ships and prison ships. Should the bureau's recommendation meet the department's approval, it is proposed that the marines shall be withdrawn from the ships of the fleet gradually. The bureau is prepared at the present time to relieve the detachments of eight ships, and by the 1st of next July it is probable that they could be relieved from all cruising ships.

Very respectfully,
J. E. PILLSBURY,
Chief of Bureau.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

I have here letters from some other naval officers. I have shown it has met with the approval of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, the Secretary of the Navy, and the President of the United States. I have extracts from the testimony of officers. Admiral Dewey says, January 11, 1909:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE ADMIRAL OF THE NAVY, MILLS BUILDING,
Washington, January 11, 1909.

MY DEAR FULLAM:—

Commander Fullam—

I have received your letter of 7th instant setting forth reasons why the President's recent order withdrawing marines from ships should not be nullified; and having read with much interest, find your arguments unanswerable.

I was recently requested to appear before the House Naval Committee in connection with this subject, but was unable to attend owing to my having been laid up for some time with sciatica.

I may, however, be given a chance to appear at some future date, when I hope to be able to make use of your excellent arguments.

Thanking you for your letter and with regards for Mrs. Fullam and yourself, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,
GEORGE DEWEY.

Commander W. F. FULLAM, U. S. Navy,
Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I.

Rear-Admiral Converse I have already quoted. It appears in his official report for 1906. Rear-Admiral Evans takes the same view. So does Rear-Admiral Sperry, the present commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet; Rear-Admiral Swinburne, commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet; Rear-Admiral Frederick Rogers, commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet; and Rear-Admiral Ingersoll, representing the General Board of the Navy. Then come the captains of the ships which have been on the trip around the world. I have here somewhere extracts from their testimony, but I can not put my hands upon it. They all speak in the highest terms of the conduct of our sailors upon the cruise which has just been concluded.

Mr. FRYE. Do the captains agree?

Mr. LODGE. They all agree.

Secretary Metcalf, in his report for 1908, says:

Too much can not be said of the magnificent conduct of the enlisted personnel throughout the history of this voyage and in the presence of an unprecedented succession of entertainments and shore hospitalities.

The occasion has brought to the front that element of greatest strength in our navy—the personal characteristics of the enlisted force.

Telegram from the commander in chief United States Atlantic Fleet:

NAPLES, January 13, 1909.

Efficiency of ships having no marines has been increased. Commander in chief and captains of Vermont and Connecticut consider that marines should be removed from all ships.

REAR-ADMIRAL SPERRY,
Commander in Chief Atlantic Fleet.

Telegram from the commander in chief United States Pacific Fleet:

TALACAHUANO, January 12, 1909.

Rear-Admiral Sebree and commanding officers, excepting Captain Smith, who joined at Panama, report efficiency of ships improved by removal of marines. They request continuance present arrangements, recommending removal marines from all ships. I concur with recommendation, but earnestly recommend marines remain under naval authority.

REAR-ADMIRAL SWINBURNE,
Commander in Chief Pacific Fleet.

Then extracts follow showing the good conduct of our men otherwise, which it is not necessary, probably, for me to read. The excellent conduct of the men has been very remarkable.

It is in the interest, in my judgment, of the good discipline of the ships and in the best interests of the seamen—it is the belief of all the younger officers, certainly, who are brought into close contact with the men—that discipline will be improved by the gradual removal of the marines and their practical confinement to shore duty and expeditionary duty.

As for the matter of expense, that we must replace the marines with a corresponding number of seamen, it is quite true that that will have to be done; but the Marine Corps is bound to be increased for the increased shore duty for the increased fleet in any event, and it is only a question whether we shall make the increase in the blue jackets or whether we shall make the increase in the Marine Corps.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Massachusetts is one of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, is he not?

Mr. LODGE. I am not.

Mr. DIXON. Was there any hearing before the Committee on Naval Affairs on this question of the marines?

Mr. LODGE. That I do not know.

Mr. HALE. There was a very full and exhaustive hearing on this whole question before the House committee, taken down in full and made a part of their report. The Committee on Naval Affairs in the House upon that hearing unanimously reported the provision the Senate committee has now put upon the bill, and when it reached the Senate the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate had before it all the testimony taken in the House, which was followed by their report of this amendment. Instead of going over the same testimony, the committee of the Senate adopted the conclusions which the House committee had adopted.

Mr. LODGE. I have looked over that hearing, Mr. President, and I am bound to say it did not convince me. The principal witnesses seemed to be marine officers who never go to sea. They seemed to be the principal opponents of leaving with the President the discretion of withdrawing the marines.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will examine the hearings of the committee fully, the committee heard not only marine officers, but distinguished line officers, the Secretary of the Navy, and Admiral Pillsbury, and had the whole case before them.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly they did, but I mean that most of the witnesses who argued for the retention of the marines, as I gathered, were marine officers of higher grades who never go to sea.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is only fair to say at this point, while I have no disposition to limit this discussion, I supposed the Senator from Massachusetts rose to make a point of order against the amendment. Not having done so, I think it just to say that I intend at the proper time to make the point of order which the Senator from Massachusetts declared would be well taken. I do not believe that we should enact any such important legislation curtailing or interfering with what I believe to be the constitutional power of the Commander in Chief in an appropriation bill. We have enough of those in this appropriation bill without importing any unnecessary ones.

Mr. LODGE. In this connection I am reminded to say that if we leave it where it is we do not compel the President to withdraw the marines; it is left discretionary with him, as it has been from the beginning of the navy. If it is a mistake to withdraw the marines, it is perfectly possible for the next President to put them back. There is nothing final about the order. He can put them back or keep them off the ships, as he pleases. But this amendment proposes to compel him to keep a certain number of marines on the ships whether it proves wise or unwise. He is to have no choice at all. He is to have no discretion. The Navy Department is to have no discretion. It is to be decided here that so many marines, one-fifth, shall go to sea, not that all ships shall have them, but that some of the ships shall have them, leaving him discretion to send more if he chooses, but no other discretion is left with him at all.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts agree with the Senator from Iowa that the President has a constitutional power that is not subject to the laws of Congress? The Senator from Iowa has just said that what the President did was the exercise of a constitutional power. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts the question whether the President has any constitutional power in regard to this subject, except the power that can be regulated by an act of Congress?

Mr. LODGE. I think that unquestionably it can be regulated by an act of Congress. I think this is a normal and proper duty of the Commander in Chief, and that it should be left with him, but if Congress chooses to provide that we shall have a corps of 10,000 marines and they shall all go to sea, Congress has, in my opinion, undoubtedly the right so to provide by law. Congress has power under the Constitution, as I understand, to make rules and regulations for the government of the force—not to govern the force, but to make rules and regulations for its government.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Iowa has asserted a proposition that the President has frequently asserted, that as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy he is not subject to the laws of Congress. I am glad to see that the Senator from Massachusetts does not agree with the Senator from Iowa on that proposition.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to discuss the constitutional question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Did the Senator from Maryland understand me to say that the President of the United States is not subject to the laws of Congress in any respect?

Mr. RAYNER. I did not understand you to say that. I understood you to say that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has a constitutional right to do whatever he wants with reference to the marines. If I was mistaken about that, I will be glad to be corrected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I asserted, and I reassert, that, in my opinion, the President of the United States has the right to determine whether the Marine Corps shall be employed upon ships or employed upon the shore and that Congress has no authority to interfere with that discretion. Congress has the authority to say that there shall be no Marine Corps or no seamen, if you please, but Congress has, in my opinion, no greater authority to declare what is the declaration in this amendment that it would have to say during the progress of a war that no infantry regiments should approach within a mile of any battery.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Iowa to say that, and I say the Senator from Iowa is wrong. Is the President, in reference to the marines or in reference to the land and naval forces, subject to any laws that Congress may pass? This is a very important matter, which has been discussed before in the Senate, and the President has always asserted that, as the constitutional Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he is not subject to the laws of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. RAYNER. I have not quite finished yet, but still I will yield.

Mr. BORAH. I will wait until the Senator from Maryland concludes.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to hear the question.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask if the Senator from Maryland contends that the President, as the Commander in Chief, has no constitutional powers which are not subject to the control of Congress?

Mr. RAYNER. I contend that Congress has the right to make all rules and regulations for the government of the army and navy, and that the President is absolutely subject to any rules and regulations that Congress may make. I am without the authorities now, but I discussed this question once before in the Senate. I am perfectly satisfied that this is an absolutely constitutional measure, and when Congress passes a law making regulations for the government of the land and naval forces the President himself must obey those regulations, and he has no power as the constitutional commander of the army and navy paramount to the power that is resident here in Congress to regulate the land and naval forces.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the discussion of the Constitution is always most interesting, but I am not making even indirectly an assault upon the Constitution.

Mr. BACON rose.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator understands that. He entirely understands that, but the Senator from Iowa was making a most serious——

Mr. LODGE. I saw the Senator from Georgia get up, and I knew the Constitution was in peril.

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but I will say that in the keeping of the Senator from Massachusetts it would always be in peril.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator from Iowa has made a most serious assault upon the Constitution; an assault that ought to be answered. We ought once and for all time to understand that if we pass an act of Congress providing for the regulation of the land and naval forces, the President of the United States is bound to obey that act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I only want to say, not for the purpose of discussing it at this time, that under the Constitution the President of the United States is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. As such Commander in Chief he has certain constitutional powers which he may exercise and which Congress can not control, and that question has been settled, in my opinion, by our Supreme Court in numerous cases.

Mr. RAYNER. I would be very much obliged——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. I should like to have authorities upon that point. I should like to have one single authority of the Supreme Court that the President of the United States can exercise constitutional powers in reference to the land and naval forces that are not subject to an act of Congress. I should like to see a case on that point.

Mr. BORAH. I have not the authorities at hand, but I have them collated. I have them so that I can, if necessary, furnish them to the Senator, which I will be glad to do without charge.

Mr. RAYNER. I do not think they will be worth anything. Therefore I would not pay anything for them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, furthermore, I will say that I have collated a statement of a number of leading lawyers of this body upon this same subject, and I do not stand alone in this matter. If I did, I would have some temerity in contradicting the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Some time ago, at the kind suggestion of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Naval Committee, I undertook to furnish him with authorities the other way, and I venture to say that the authorities are all one way, that while the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, when the Constitution provides that Congress can "raise and support armies," that it can "provide and maintain a navy," that it can "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," if Congress passes a bill providing and maintaining a navy, raising and supporting armies, the making of rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, the President is subject to the act of Congress. All the writers upon military law are in accord upon that subject, and I know of no case at all that conflicts with that position.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not intend by my suggestion to provoke a discussion upon any constitutional question. The very fact, however, that my suggestion has created this difference of opinion is a conclusive reason in support of the point of order which I intend to make. We can not afford to settle these grave constitutional powers in an amendment to an appropriation bill. When that question shall come properly before the Senate I will be very glad to submit my views with regard to the constitutional power of the President in such an instance. I make the point of order that this is general legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. The point of order is debatable if it is to be submitted.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that as Senators are discussing the merits of the measure the Senator from Iowa withhold his point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not intend to insist upon it at the present moment. I simply intended to give notice that I would insist upon the point of order at the proper time.

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to prolong the debate by a discussion of the constitutional question at this time. I only want it understood that, so far as my view of the matter goes, the position which I took is a correct one. The Senator from Maryland says that the writers upon military law have decided otherwise. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided otherwise than that. I have not any doubt about the matter and, if it becomes necessary, I will try to get the authority for it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything that would arouse the most sensitive friend of the Constitution. I started out by reading the statute under which it was plain that the President had the power to direct whether the marines should be employed on board ship or not. The statute was permissive and gave him authority to send them there in his discretion. So his action was both legal and constitutional when this order was issued, and I do not suppose that is contested by anybody.

My objection was that it was a sudden change of a well-settled policy of this Government, which, from the beginning of the navy, had left it within the discretion of the Commander in Chief, and the proper place, I think, to leave it, whether there should be marines sent on board ship, and how many should be sent, if any. That has been the universal practice.

Now, Congress comes in for the purpose of revoking an executive order properly, legally, and constitutionally issued; not with a view of curbing the present President. This bill will not become a law until he shall have been for months out of office, but it will put fetters upon the hands of the next President without giving him the slighest chance to consider whether it is wise to have marines on board ship or whether it is not. Under the old law he can replace them if he does not think it best to keep them there, but all discretion is taken from him by this bill, and we have an ironclad system which takes over certainly what I believe is a normal and reasonable function of a Commander in Chief and prevents him from exercising it.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I merely want to ask one question for enlightenment. The amendment provides that not less than 8 per cent of the enlisted men on the battle ships shall be from the Marine Corps, and that the appropriation shall lapse if 8 per cent are not serving. I want to ask the Senator what would be the effect of this provision provided the battle ships were sent out from port with 8 per cent of Marine Corps men on board and of that 8 per cent one-third should desert or die of cholera.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator means assuming that this amendment becomes a law?

Mr. DIXON. Yes, sir; if the appropriation stands.

Mr. LODGE. I suppose it would lapse unless the full 8 per cent is kept up.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to finish the sentence, which I desire to do?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. RAYNER. I have just sent for one among a number of volumes upon military law, and it is the best statement from any writer upon the subject that I know of and is the best book, in my judgment, which has been written upon military law. I only want to read a few lines, to show the Senator from Idaho how greatly he is mistaken upon the proposition which he has announced to the Senate.

I read from O'Brien's Courts-Martial, on page 1:

> According to the Constitution, Congress has absolute power over the army. It can create, organize, increase, or disband it at its mere will and pleasure. It has the exclusive power of making rules and articles of war and of legislating for the public force. The military laws which it may be pleased to enact in pursuance of the Constitution are as binding on the President as on the private soldier, and there is no power in the Commonwealth which dare disregard or deviate from the slightest of its ordinances.

I say that is the law and the Supreme Court has never decided otherwise.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I do not disagree at all with the proposition of law which has just been stated by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. The difficulty is, he does not distinguish between creating, regulating, controlling, and bringing into existence an army and commanding it. I say that the President as Commander in Chief of the Army has the powers which belong to a commander in chief—that is, to command the army—and when he issues an order which has been made under the authority intrusted to him by Congress, that order is conclusive, and Congress has no power to annul it or set it aside. He may dispose of the army; he may send the fleet here and there, because that is a part of the powers of the Commander in Chief. To raise the army, to regulate it, to feed it, and provide rules and regulations for its government belongs to Congress.

Mr. LODGE. On the question of expense, it is stated by the Bureau of Navigation, from which I get my information, that to replace 2,000 marines and marine officers with blue jackets on board ship will result in an actual saving to the Government of $122,000 annually. The reason for this saving is that the expense of providing marine officers is considerable, whereas the total number of midshipmen and line officers need not be and will not be increased and no expense will be entailed if more line officers are assigned to ships to replace the marine officers.

That is the figuring of the department as to the actual expense. I do not know whether it is correct or not, but it is perfectly clear that no additional expense will be incurred by replacing with blue jackets the 2,000 marines now on board ship.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HALE. I would say that the Committee on Naval Affairs looked into that matter, and, I think, unanimously came to the conclusion, which, it seems to me, must be apparent to everybody, that if you take 2,000 marines from the ships where they are doing duty, thereby reducing the force upon the ships, and send the marines somewhere else, you have got to replace them by additional men. The committee believed that we should be called upon at once to fill those places by additional men in the navy and that the expenses would be anywhere from four or five to six hundred thousand dollars.

The proposition seems to be as plain as possible. You are putting your marines somewhere else and taking them away from the ships. We have not too many men now, and you have got to increase the naval force.

Moreover, the committee realize that it is not intended that this shall stop. The purpose—I will not say of everybody, but the underlying purpose—is to take these people away from the navy and in the end turn them over to the army. To that the committee is decidedly opposed, and I think the naval officers are opposed to it, but that is what we shall be confronted with if we take them away from the ships.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am as much opposed to taking the marines away from the naval authorities as is the Senator from Maine, but I see no more reason why withdrawing them from the ships shall force them into the army than it forces them into the army of Germany or of France, where they are not used on ships.

Moreover, as to expense, I do not think it is quite so plain as the Senator from Maine makes it. Of course it is perfectly obvious that if you take 2,000 marines off the ships and replace them with 2,000 blue jackets you will have the additional expense of the blue jackets; but if you keep the 2,000 marines on the ships, you will have to increase your Marine Corps in order to meet the demands made upon that corps by the increased labor for which they are required at home. The department asked for an increased Marine Corps last year, and got it. They are asking for another increase this year. They have not got it, but they are demanding an increase.

I have seen that corps rise from 3,000 men to 10,000 men in the short time I have been here. If you leave the marines on board ship, you are going to increase the Marine Corps. If you take them off the ships, you will not need to increase your Marine Corps probably for a good many years to come, but you will have to increase your blue jackets. It is six of one and half a dozen of the other so far as the change of men goes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Supposing the marines are kept off the ships, what are we going to do with them? What is the purpose?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose we shall use them. We use 8,000 of them now. We have got them at the navy-yards; we have got them at the naval stations; and we use them as they have been used at all the distant points where we have had to send them on expeditions, to keep them as an expeditionary force. We must have a guard for our navy-yards. We must have a guard for our naval stations. We must have marines at Guantanamo. We must have marines in the Philippines. We must have marines in Guam. Tutuila is in the hands of the navy, and you must have marines there.

Mr. TILLMAN. As I understand, the marines are the military branch of the service, and in a way take the place of soldiers.

Mr. LODGE. That is true, and I am not trying to interfere with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. At the same time they are on shipboard and are trained as sailors to manipulate the great guns and to do a part of the fighting when any fighting is to be done.

Mr. LODGE. I want to retain them as soldiers and not have them do the duties of seamen. They are now used as gun crews. They man some of the guns, but their gunnery record is inferior to that of the blue jackets. They are not good gunners.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then it is a question of practice. If you give them as long a time and enough powder, they certainly will hit as many targets as the blue jackets, when they are all recruited from the same source.

Mr. du PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. du PONT. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, so far as this question of additional expense is concerned, whether, in the last analysis, it does not come down to whether the cost of 2,000 marines is or is not less than the cost of 2,000 sailors?

Mr. LODGE. I can not answer that without a comparison of the tables. I am not sure, but I think their pay is the same.

Mr. du PONT. That is the whole question, if there is any question of economy.

Mr. LODGE. It is admitted by everybody, I think, that there is economy in the matter of officers; that is, if you have sailors instead of marines on the ships, and the sailors perform the same duties as the marines, they come under the command of the existing naval officers, whose number will not have to be increased at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask a question there. Would it not be necessary, then, to increase our naval officers? Have we a surplus of them?

Mr. LODGE. No. I am told there will not be slightest need of it. You carry so many officers on board a battle ship. If you substitute blue jackets for marines, the same officers will take charge of the additional men. They will all be one body.

Mr. HEYBURN. If you increase the number of blue jackets, then you will not be compelled to increase the number of officers over the blue jackets?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. But you would substitute naval officers for marine corps officers?

Mr. LODGE. The marines bring their officers with them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HALE. I do not want that conclusion of the Senator from Massachusetts to be taken as admitted. I have no doubt, if you expel the marines from this service—which nobody has disturbed for a hundred years until now—and supply their places by enlisted seamen, that on every ship you will increase the number of officers of the navy correspondent with the increase on the part of the seamen. I have no doubt that that will result, and I therefore do not agree with the conclusions of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I differ with great hesitation from the Senator from Maine, but I do not think that the officers on board a ship are detailed in proportion to the number of men. I think very largely the governing thing on board ship is the duty to which the officers are assigned, and I am assured by the Bureau of Navigation that that would involve no increase whatever in the number of officers. I have no other authority than that.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is true—that is, I do not think in operation that it will so work out. I think the number of officers largely is correspondent to the number of men. If a battle ship has 600 seamen and 200 marines, making 800, the number of officers that will be put upon the ship for 800 men will be increased over what it was when there were only 600 men, just as a battle ship which calls for 800 men has more officers, as the Register will show, than the 600-man battle ship.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably.

Mr. HALE. And the 600-men ship will have more officers than the 400-men ship. The measure of the number of officers, I think, is as much the number of men as any other one thing. It is not absolutely controlling, but it controls as much as anything.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on every ship there are a certain number of watch officers. On the smaller ships there may not be more than four. If you add to the number of men under command it will not change the number of watch officers. I do not mean to say that the size of the ship and the number of the crew has no effect; but I do say it is not the only element. In the mere matter of standing watch they must have a certain number of officers on every ship in order to have enough to stand the watches and give the proper relief.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to correct the statement of the Senator as to the pay of the blue jackets and marines. The Senator stated it was the same.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that I thought it was; but I was not sure.

Mr. PERKINS. The pay per annum of the sailor is $483.33 and of the marine $263.07. At least that is the testimony of Colonel Richards in the hearings before the House committee.

Mr. LODGE. That leaves out of consideration the fact that the uniforms of the marines are more expensive; that the marines are obliged to have barracks built for them; that they must have extensive quarters on shore, while the seaman lives on his ship or on a receiving ship at the navy-yard. I was speaking from memory of the pay bill last year when we equalized the pay. I understood the pay of the soldier, marine, and sailor was equalized so far as possible.

The marine, except in gunnery, performs none of the duties of the seaman. His duties are those simply of a police force of the ship. The marines do have guns, but the results attained by marine gun crews are not as good as those attained by gun crews of blue jackets.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended. It seems to me that this is a question that may be very wisely left where it is has always been left by the statute—with the Commander in Chief of the military forces. I think that is the natural place to leave it. I think it is a very risky thing to attempt here to lay down a hard and fast rule as to how many marines shall go to sea and provide it in such a way that with the growth of the navy you must have a continual growth of the Marine Corps.

I do not believe that it is a good thing for the discipline of the ship to have marines aboard. I believe that the present class of seamen in our navy will be infinitely better off, just as our soldiers are better off, maintaining their own discipline. I myself hope that if this great change is to be made, it will not be made by an amendment to an appropriation bill which we have got to consider in a few minutes in the closing hours of a dying Congress.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I shall only take a few moments. I do not intend to discuss at all the policy of this provision. I am satisfied that under the statutes as they exist now the President has an arbitrary and almost unlimited discretion; but, in my judgment, as is usual with him, he has exercised a most tyrannical and despotic power. However, I do not propose to discuss that branch of the subject. I only want to supplement what I said by adding that so far as his constitutional power goes, he is subject to any law that we may pass. In addition to the reference that I gave, I want to give one or two more references from the same author. I quote from page 31:

> The command of the President is, indeed, absolute within its sphere, but its sphere is bounded on all sides by law. The moment the Executive oversteps the boundaries prescribed, he becomes powerless, and his commands are of no force.
> So contracted is the actual authority of the President that, but for the protective power of his qualified veto, his command might be so restricted by legislation as to destroy its utility.
> As the Executive has no legislative power, it is plain that the regulations issued by him to the army are not law; and as he is as much bound by law as any other citizen, it follows that if any of them conflict with law they are so far null and void; otherwise they are constitutionally binding as military commands.
> In all that relates to the raising of an army, to its strength, to its organization, to its criminal code, Congress is omnipotent, the President powerless.

If there is any authority that contradicts that, I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has said that all that is wanted or needful is to leave things as they are. The amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, being like the one reported in the House of Representatives, is on the basis of not disturbing a condition that has existed for a hundred years. During that time the Marine Corps has been an important and accepted and useful part of the naval establishment, and no Executive, in that time, has ever thought of interposing a presidential order and disrupting this old, harmonious condition that has existed for a century. All that the committee seeks to accomplish now by this provision, as a limitation on the expenditure, put upon an appropriation bill as practically the only place where it could be put, is to retain the old status of the Marine Corps.

I have known something of the services the Marine Corps has rendered to the Navy, to the Government, and to the people in years past. They have been an essential and invaluable part of the naval establishment; they have gone with the ships into every place where there was an emergency or peril or danger, and they have not only never been found wanting, but have never failed to perform the most important part of the duties of a naval expeditionary force. The part that they performed in China is well known to everybody.

I know something about—and this is very important, Senators—the services that were rendered by the Marine Corps at the most critical period on the Isthmus of Panama, when there was imminent danger of an outbreak, a conflict, and a war. The army demanded the privilege of sending two regiments to Panama to meet the forces of the Republic of Colombia. Under the dispensation, which the President has disturbed and destroyed, there were at that time, as there have always been at important emergencies and junctures in our affairs, four or five hundred marine-corps men, a disciplined, active, efficient military force, that would not have been there had they not been carried there upon the ship.

I remember very well that the then Secretary of the Navy opposed the sending of the troops of the army down there. He insisted that the Marine Corps was ample for every emergency, and gave his instructions to the marine-corps contingent that was upon the Isthmus not to provoke war, not to advance war, but to avoid war, and, if necessary, for the moment to retreat to save war. Those men, a part of the expeditionary force of the United States, carried there upon ships of the navy, followed the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy; and I say, Mr. President, to the Senate, from my knowledge of that situation—and the Secretary of the Navy agreed with me in that—that if the army had sent down two regiments of men to be put into the service we should have had a war with Colombia in twenty-four hours; and, while we would have overwhelmed Colombia, it would have cost us fifty or a hundred million dollars. That instance alone of itself demonstrates the essential need of this valuable, brave, and accomplished corps of men, whose services in order to be of any use should be upon the ships.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine—he has been very instructive in his remarks—of which one of the expeditions he is speaking? Was it the one of which Admiral Jouett had command—the last one?

Mr. HALE. It was at the most critical time, when the government was being established down there. I do not remember who was in command of the fleet. The Senator can easily identify it historically.

Mr. MONEY. There were two expeditions, the Senator will recollect, and I supposed he was alluding to the last one from the fact that he mentioned that the army insisted upon sending two regiments down there.

Mr. HALE. I mean the one which established the Isthmian government.

Mr. MONEY. That was Admiral Jouett's.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I should like to ask the Senator how many enlisted men there are now in the Marine Corps?

Mr. HALE. Ten thousand—I will not say "ten thousand," because the corps is not recruited up to the maximum, but there are perhaps actually between eight and nine thousand.

Mr. FULTON. What especial service can they perform for the navy on shore?

Mr. HALE. That naturally opens the entire question. It is not intended that they all shall be upon the ships. Part of their duty is guarding and caring for the navy-yards and naval stations.

Mr. FULTON. To promote their highest and best efficiency, ought they not to have training at sea?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have here a statement from the Navy Department. There are only 1,300 marines now afloat.

Mr. HALE. I did not know there were so many as that, because they have been taken off the ships.

Mr. LODGE. I mean there are 1,300 now afloat. At the time of the order there were 2,000.

Mr. HALE. Just about 2,000, or about a quarter of the enlisted force of the Marine Corps.

Mr. LODGE. Then 8,000 were employed on shore, were they not?

Mr. HALE. No; the 8,000 included the 2,000.

Mr. LODGE. But the remainder, 6,000, were all employed on shore?

Mr. HALE. They were all employed on shore.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me just one word, I agree with all he says about the Marine Corps and its use; but I never understood that the President's order affected their employment as an expeditionary force at all. On the contrary, they would be used for that.

Mr. HALE. I want to come to that. The pride that these men naturally have in the service that they have performed, their discipline and value upon the ships, is the one thing that lies nearest to their hearts and their ambitions. It is another thing, Mr. President, to dump these men onto transports and to herd them together upon outlying and auxiliary ships of the navy and trail them along by themselves, herded in that way, only to be called upon when an emergency arises. Upon every expeditionary fleet that this country shall ever send forth—and I hope they will be few—there should be this valuable corps as a part of the ship's equipment, so that, instead of depending upon a corps that is exiled from the ship and put into auxiliary ships, the colliers, or whatever they may be, you will have them at the moment when needed ready for service. One of the best things the Marine Corps has accomplished in its history has been in instances like that which I have cited. It has prevented war, when the army would have stimulated war, that being the business of the army.

Mr. President, this subject has been thoroughly thrashed out——

Mr. MONEY. I should like to make a few remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MONEY. If the Senator is about to yield the floor, I should like to occupy it for a few moments only. I do not want to delay the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator from Mississippi desire to ask me a question, or will he wait until I shall have concluded?

Mr. MONEY. No; I thought the Senator was about to conclude.

Mr. HALE. I was, because I do not want to take up time. It is not necessary. The provision in the appropriation bill is precisely the provision that comes within the constitutional point so well made by the Senator from Maryland. It takes upon Congress the responsibility under the provision which gives the conduct and regulation of the military establishment to Congress. It gives that force here in the appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator if he has the order of the President at hand, in order that we may compare it——

Mr. HALE. It is in the papers. It is very distinct.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not recall it so distinctly as I should like to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is easy to see that the proposition submitted by the Senator from Maryland must be the true, fundamental, profound proposition on which shall be rested the conduct and regulation of the military forces of the Government. The President undoubtedly had the right to issue the order, which no President had ever attempted to do in a hundred years, and Congress has upon itself the responsibility of restoring that condition.

What would Senators think if, at a time of emergency, the President, a President who was more for peace than for war and ignominiously for peace instead of honorable war, should order, upon the proposition that there was no danger of war, every ship of the navy into a navy-yard, to be laid up? If the President has the power, and Congress can not overrule him, upon the personnel of the navy, he has the same power over the ships themselves. Does anybody believe that in a condition like that Congress for a moment would hesitate to take upon itself the conduct and regulation, under the Constitution, of the navy of the United States and order those ships out against the presidential mandate? I am only giving that as an illustration. And that is all that is attempted to be done here, under the undoubted authority that Congress has, not to abandon everything in the conduct and regulation of the army and the navy to the President, but to establish a rule that shall for the time override it may be a presidential order.

I am not going to discuss the question of the point of order. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] did not make it, but the Senator from Iowa has indicated that he would. I am not going to argue it, although I have plenty of citations here. The discussion that has already arisen has shown that it is a very debatable question—it is a very serious question, where the line is drawn—whether the Senator from Maryland is right, as I think he is, or the Senator from Idaho is right, as I think he is wrong; and being of that mind, for one I am entirely willing that it shall be submitted to the action of the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I do not possess enough knowledge on the subject of the Marine Corps to determine for myself what disposition should be made of the proposed amendment, but I can not escape the feeling that the Marine Corps should have sea training, and a very considerable amount of it. I am disposed, so far as I am concerned, to accept the judgment of the committee as to the policy of this amendment.

I simply wish to say a word on the question suggested by the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in which he contends that it is not competent for Congress to make this regulation. It seems to me, with all deference to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, that that is a most astounding statement and discloses a very deplorable situation, if true. I quite agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is distinct and separate from the power of Congress to raise and support armies and navies and to make rules for the regulation of the army and navy within a certain sphere.

I concede that Congress can not absolutely control and fetter the President, but that is simply when and while he acts as commander in the field and has charge of the movements of military forces and matters of that character that pertain distinctly and peculiarly to the duties of a commander in chief. In those matters he is supreme, but after all he is subordinate in all cases to such rules and regulations as Congress shall make. Congress can not deprive him of the position of commander in chief. It can not substitute some other official or person in his stead. He is by the Constitution Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, but he must exercise his authority subject to the rules and regulations made and to be made by Congress.

Mr. Hamilton, in his Federalist, very clearly stated what his duties were supposed to be by the framers of the Constitution. He said:

> The President is to be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. In this respect his authority would be nominally the same with that of the King of Great Britain, but in substance much inferior to it. It would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first general and admiral of the confederacy—

That is, he is nothing more than any other commander in point of power, except that he is the supreme commander—> while that of the British king extends to the declaring of war and to the raising and regulating of fleets and armies.

All of which, namely, the raising and regulating of fleets and armies, pertains to Congress.

Is this proposed amendment anything more than a regulation? It is a regulation of the navy and provision as to in what manner the Marine Corps shall serve the Nation, where it shall be placed, how long it shall remain at sea, or whether it shall go at all or not. Is not that a regulation of the naval forces? It seems to me that the contrary can not be reasonably contended for. To say that Congress can not make such a regulation as that is to strip Congress absolutely of all power in the matter of making rules and regulations for the army and navy.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does the Senator from Oregon think that the Constitution does more than to designate the rank?

Mr. FULTON. That is all; nothing more. He is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy by the Constitution, and therefore no other person can be appointed to that office.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Oregon contend that he has no power as Commander in Chief except nominal, titular power?

Mr. FULTON. Oh, no; he has the powers of Commander in Chief. There must be a commander in chief. Were the President not named by the Constitution it would be incumbent, of course, upon Congress to provide for one. But the commander in chief would be subject to the regulations and rules laid down by Congress, as is the President. Of course he would have something to do. It is not to be supposed that a commander in chief will not have anything to do; that he will not command. He executes the rules and regulations laid down by Congress for the government of the army.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. FULTON. That is what he does, so far as the army in the field is concerned. Of course we understand the scope and extent of the authority of a commander in chief in the field when he is maneuvering forces.

I agree with the statement the Senator from Idaho made a while ago that the functions of Congress and those of the Commander in Chief are distinct and separate. In some respects Congress could not interfere with him. It could not substitute somebody else. Congress could not say how he should maneuver a certain army in the field.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I put the same question to the Senator from Oregon that I did a few moments ago. Suppose Congress were to enact a regulation declaring that in the event of war the Commander in Chief should not allow any company of infantry to approach within one-half mile of any battery. Would that be a valid regulation put upon the Commander in Chief.

Mr. FULTON. Of course such a thing is impossible to assume. In the first place, Congress would never undertake to make any such regulation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that is so, but I ask for the purpose of testing your rule.

Mr. FULTON. In the second place, that would be purely a matter of military tactics, which would have to be determined by the Commander in Chief in the field. It is possible Congress would not have power to do that. I would not undertake to say. It might be trenching upon the matter of commanding the army in the field, and I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FULTON. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether or not, if Congress deemed it important that Congress should legislate without the overawing influence of an army, it would be within its power to direct the President of the United States not to permit any armed forces within the District of Columbia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it has that power.

Mr. BACON. Of course; and it has the power in any other way to direct that an army shall be at a certain place or shall not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. That, in my judgment, is the dividing line upon this question. Congress has not the power to say that an army shall be at a particular place at a particular time or shall maneuver in a particular instance. That belongs exclusively to the Commander in Chief of the Army. The dividing line is between the question of raising, supporting, and regulating an army, and commanding it. It is difficult to define, for the reason that it is difficult to tell where the dividing line is. But when it is ascertained, there is no question about the constitutional provision covering it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him the same question that I asked the Senator from Iowa? Does the Senator doubt the power of Congress, whenever it deems it important so to legislate, to say that the President shall not keep in the city of Washington any part of the army?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; I think Congress would have that power; but that is a different proposition.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it is.

Mr. BORAH. That is a difference of opinion, upon which we are not likely to agree this afternoon.

Mr. FULTON. After all——

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho if he thinks it would be a proper provision in an appropriation bill to provide that no part of the item for pay should be used to pay the navy if they were stationed at certain points? Would that be an interference with the executive power or the power of the Commander in Chief?

Mr. BORAH. My opinion is, it would be.

Mr. FULTON. I think it would be perfectly competent for Congress to make such a regulation. If the Senator means whether it is proper in an appropriation bill, of course that simply raises the parliamentary question. Speaking of the power of Congress, I have no doubt that Congress has power to say that the money shall not be expended in the payment of a particular corps of the army if it shall be stationed at a particular place.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield further to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if that was not done in the appropriation bills of 1876 and 1877?

Mr. FULTON. I do not know.

Mr. BRIGGS. Was it not provided that no part of the appropriation for the army should be used to pay troops stationed in the South?

Mr. FULTON. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to make all rules and regulations for the army; and, of course, it could make rules that would operate, if carried out, to destroy the Nation. But it is not going to make such rules. But the power to make all rules for the regulation of the army is vested absolutely in Congress, and in that field it is supreme.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from Oregon if the Commander in Chief should make an order to the effect that the navy should maneuver at New Orleans, could Congress by legislation cancel or set aside or annul that order?

Mr. FULTON. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BORAH. It could?

Mr. FULTON. I have no doubt Congress can require the army to be kept in a certain section. It can require the army to be removed from one section, if it deems it incompatible with the public welfare that it should be stationed there. I have no doubt of that. It seems to me there can be no question about it.

Mr. BORAH. That was not the question which I presented to the Senator. Congress could undoubtedly previously establish a rule and regulation by which the President would be controlled in these matters.

Mr. FULTON. Yes. And the simple fact that the President in advance had sent the army there would not preclude Congress from still exercising its constitutional function of ordering it removed from there.

Mr. BORAH. That is where we differ.

Mr. FULTON. That is where the Senator differs not with me so much as he does with the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I do not differ with the Constitution so much as I do with the Senator's interpretation of it. Mr. Pomeroy calls attention to that specific fact as an instance——

Mr. FULTON. I am aware of that.

Mr. BORAH. In which Congress can not interfere with the President's power; and Pomeroy is reasonably acceptable as a commentator of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Extreme examples sometimes prove the law. Suppose that upon the occasion of a doubtful presidential election, in which the incumbent was a candidate, he saw fit to order 50,000 men to the capital; does the Senator doubt the power of Congress by law to say that they should be ordered elsewhere? If so, we have very little barrier between ourselves and despotism whenever a bad man happens to be President.

Mr. BORAH. The fathers who framed the Constitution did not seem to know whether the bad men would be in Congress or in the presidential chair. So they lodged certain powers with both of them, and lodged elsewhere the power to remedy either one of the evils when they should exercise their powers not in accordance with the Constitution. If the President should make such an order, and it should be deemed in violation of his prerogative as President or Commander in Chief, there is a way to reach it, and a provision made by which it can be reached. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator, before he goes further, will answer the question. He says there is a way to reach it. If, in an emergency such as I have mentioned, the President should order 50,000 troops to the capital (Congress being in session, and believing it to be dangerous to the liberties of the country that they should come here), in what way, if it were not to be done by act of Congress, would the evil be averted?

Mr. BORAH. I undertake to say that if the President should make an order directing the army to a particular place, that particular order could not be canceled by the act of Congress, and I have not any doubt about the rule.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FULTON. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Idaho that that has been done on more than one occasion by statutes since I have been in the Senate. In the early stages after the war, when there was complaint of the army in the South, Congress exercised that power over and over—at least three or four times.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I do not know what particular statutes have been passed and referred to by the Senator. I know some which have been passed upon by the courts. Undoubtedly, however, the Senator is correct.

But I want to call attention to the fact that Senator Spooner in discussing the question of the order of the President discharging the members of the Brownsville companies, stated upon the floor of the Senate that it was not within the power of Congress to cancel that order. He stated that it was an order made by the President in the discharge of his duty as Commander in Chief, and that it was beyond the power of Congress to remedy it by passing an act nullifying it or setting it aside. That is the point I am undertaking to bring to the attention of those who are discussing this question.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate further. My recollection of the contention of Senator Spooner differs somewhat from that of the Senator from Idaho. I heard Senator Spooner make his argument. I do not think that he absolutely contended that Congress was without power to vacate the order made by the President in the Brownsville matter.

That is what he was discussing. But he suggested, as I recall, that Congress was confined to making rules, and that it could not make a special mandate in a special or particular case.

I have the most profound regard for Senator Spooner. I think he is one of the greatest lawyers this country has ever produced. But I do not think he had given that question the careful consideration its importance required. I have investigated it a great deal since then, and I have reached the conclusion that wherever Congress can act at all, it can act by either a general or a special rule, because there is no inhibition against Congress making special laws or special rules. It is purely a question whether it is within its province to act at all. If it is, Congress can make a special rule as well as it can make a general rule. The power to make a rule does not necessarily imply that it must be one of general application. We have special rules as well as general rules—rules for a special and particular purpose. I have no doubt about Congress having power, within the scope of its constitutional authority, to make a special as well as a general rule. But that does not apply to this case. What is sought to be accomplished here is to make a general regulation. The power to do that, it seems to me, can not be denied Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to put into the RECORD the executive order which I think I have heard called "violent" and "tyrannical" this afternoon. I will read it:

EXECUTIVE ORDER DEFINING THE DUTIES OF THE UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS.

In accordance with the power vested in me by section 1619, Revised Statutes of the United States, the following duties are assigned to the United States Marine Corps:

(1) To garrison the different navy-yards and naval stations, both within and beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(2) To furnish the first line of the mobile defense of naval bases and naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(3) To man such naval defenses, and to aid in manning, if necessary, such other defenses as may be erected for the defense of naval bases and naval stations beyond the continental limits of the United States.

(4) To garrison the Isthmian Canal Zone, Panama.

(5) To furnish such garrisons and expeditionary forces for duties beyond the seas as may be necessary in time of peace.

That is the whole of the "violent" and "tyrannical" order.

Mr. RAYNER. "Despotic;" not "violent."

Mr. LODGE. The "despotic order," then.

Mr. RAYNER. That is what I said.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator deny that the President had the right, under the Constitution, to make the order?

Mr. RAYNER. I repeat that that is a despotic and tyrannical order, although he has the right to do it. A man can exercise a right and still exercise it as a despot and a tyrant.

Mr. LODGE. If it is despotic for the President, in the exercise of his statutory authority, to order marines to garrison the Isthmus of Panama, I hardly know what despotism is.

Mr. RAYNER. He intends to make policemen and patrolmen and janitors out of these men. That is his idea.

Mr. HALE. The order excludes them from the ships, too.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that, of course. I was merely commenting on its "violence;" that is all.

Mr. President, I have as high an opinion of the Marine Corps as has the Senator from Maine, and appreciation of the admirable work they have done; and I should resist in any way their absorption into the army. But this is a proposition to make them, not what they have been before on the ships—not at all. Hitherto they have been on the ships, under the common direction of the Commander in Chief, just like everybody else. This is an attempt to make them, by law, a privileged class on the ships—a very different thing. It is an attempt to raise them above the seamen, and to say to the men whom you want to recruit on your ships: "We can not trust you on the ships. We must have, by law, a privileged class of policemen in a different uniform, to watch over you." It is not an encouragement to your seamen. It is your seamen who principally fight your ships. It is your seamen on whom you must principally depend; and this is an attempt to do, by law, what never was done before—to make a privileged class in the navy of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator realize that we have raised the enlisted force of the navy, by voluntary enlistment, from 8,000 to 43,000 at least?

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that.

Mr. HALE. We have had no trouble in getting enlistments, and nobody has thought that the marines were a special class, nor has any sailor or landsman proposing to enlist in the navy ever been dissuaded because the marines were a police force or interfered in any way with the seamen.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. HALE. By this amendment we only put the marines back where they have been for a hundred years.

Mr. LODGE. No, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. We do not give them any additional duties. We only keep them where they have been, under conservative government, heretofore.

Mr. LODGE. But you give them, by law, what they never have had by law before. That is the precise point; it is doing by law what never was done before. It is making them a class by law. Hitherto they have been under a common order and a common control. Now they are made a privileged class.

Mr. HALE. It was never needed to be done until now. We did not disturb this condition. The Marine Corps did not disturb this condition. It gave rise to no friction.

It worked admirably. The only thing that is asked now is to put the Marine Corps back where it has been for a hundred years.

Mr. LODGE. It was recommended, as I have said—and I again call attention to the fact—by Admiral Converse two years ago, and no action was then taken. It was recommended then by the present Chief of the Bureau of Navigation and by the Secretary of the Navy, and an order was drawn by the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Mr. HALE. When it went to the other legislative body it was instantaneously taken out.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the seamen were the fighting men on the ships.

Mr. LODGE. I said they were the principal fighting force.

Mr. BRIGGS. I did not catch the word "principal." I was going to ask the Senator whether a soldier or a sailor who manned a 5-inch gun was any less a fighter than one who manned a 10-inch gun?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all; and I did not mean anything of that sort. I meant that they are the great body of the fighting force. The marines are very few in number compared with the total number of men on a battle ship.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand the marines man the 5-inch guns and the guns of less caliber.

Mr. LODGE. They man the small guns.

Mr. BRIGGS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. It may throw some light upon this matter to refer to the statutes under which these powers are exercised. Section 1616 of the Revised Statutes was enacted in 1797, and it provides as follows:

Marines may be detached for service on board the armed vessels of the United States, and the President may detach and appoint, for service on said vessels, such of the officers of said corps as he may deem necessary.

That is the oldest law on the subject. The law under which the President has recently acted was not enacted until 1849, fifty years later. So the primary service of this class of troops was on vessels.

Mr. du PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. du PONT. I will ask the Senator from Idaho if the statute does not use the word "may," not "shall?"

Mr. HEYBURN. I so read it.

Mr. du PONT. Therefore it was simply permissory, within the discretion of the President, in the original act to which the Senator referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. I so read it.

Mr. du PONT. Whereas their duty on shore was mandatory, and the word "shall" is used.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is section 1619, referred to in the order of the Chief Executive as Commander in Chief, which reads:

The Marine Corps shall be liable to do duty in the forts and garrisons of the United States, on the seacoast, or any other duty on shore, as the President, at his discretion, may direct.

That power came from Congress and not from the President. Congress gave the President the power to change the nature of the service of the marines from the condition that had existed for more than fifty years.

Mr. LODGE. He cites the section in his order.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. It may aid us somewhat to know the original intent of the creation of this peculiar branch of the service. I read from the executive order under consideration, as follows:

In accordance with the power vested in me by section 1619, Revised Statutes of the United States, the following duties are assigned to the United States Marine Corps.

Of course he does not claim to be exercising this right by virtue of being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. He professes, on the face of the order, to be acting with the consent of Congress, as provided in section 1619. So, it seems to me, that for the consideration of this question we are not called upon to go into the question of the power of the President as Commander in Chief under the constitutional provision.

Mr. RAYNER. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. RAYNER. The very power the President has exercised is under an act of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. He recites so.

Mr. RAYNER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. And that is a comparatively recent act of Congress. Prior to that time, for the first fifty years of the Government's existence, he did not have that power.

Mr. HALE. It has never been exercised since that time until now.

Mr. HEYBURN. No. This order does not refer at all, either in language or in spirit, to section 1616, which is the original law and the controlling law, nor has Congress repealed it.

Mr. du PONT. Will the Senator from Idaho be good enough to read the original law again?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I will read it again. This is section 1616—the act of July, 1797:

Marines may be detached for service on board the armed vessels of the United States, and the President may detach and appoint for service on said vessels such of the officers of said corps as he may deem necessary.

Mr. du PONT. It is permissory. It says "may." Is not the language of that statute identical with the later statute of 1849 as far as concerns the permissory features, the features that are discretionary with the President? I think it is.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not raising that question against it. Congress gave the power, and it may control the exercise of the power.

Mr. du PONT. I understood the Senator from Idaho otherwise. I understood him to say that during the first fifty years he had not that permissory power.

Mr. HEYBURN. I said they did not so serve. I did not refer to the power of the President. I stated the service.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, while I have something more to say, I shall not take any further time on this subject. I hope we may get at this matter and get it out of the way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question relating to the power of Congress to enact this legislation is a very interesting one; and if the paragraph remains in the bill, I shall desire at a little later time to submit at some length my views upon this subject. But I now make the point of order which I suggested originally, that the amendment is general legislation, and therefore not appropriate in an appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair submits to the Senate the question, Is the amendment in order? [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it. The "ayes" have it, and the amendment is in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as it is now nearly 5 o'clock, I will move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock. I would give a good deal to avoid coming here this evening, but I hope we may thereby finish the bill. I ask the Senators to make some sacrifice of personal comfort in order that we may have a clear quorum for the transaction of business. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning in line 14, on page 60, and continued to the end of line 24, on page 68, under the subhead "Increase of the navy."

Mr. CLAY. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will allow this to be the last item in the bill to be considered.

Mr. HALE. I want to adapt the progress of the bill to the convenience of Senators. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has the first amendment, striking out these ships and substituting an auxiliary force of colliers, supply ships, and so forth. He told me he would be here in order to present his amendment and urge its adoption. Of course all the rest of the bill largely depends upon this clause for the new ships. I am entirely willing that this part of the bill shall remain open.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like at the proper time to say something, and I should prefer that it remain open until the Senator from Nevada offers his amendment.

Mr. HALE. I think that is fair.

Mr. CLAY. If I understand the situation correctly, the amendment is not now in order anyway, inasmuch as we are simply considering the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The whole matter will be left open to amendment until the reading is concluded.

Mr. McCREARY. I could not hear the Senator from Maine distinctly. Did he state that this clause about the increase of the navy would be left open until we finished the reading of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes; undoubtedly.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Increase of the navy," on page 70, after line 15, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase one destroyer whose vitals are located below the normal load water line, such vessel to cost not to exceed $400,000 and to have a speed not less than 22 knots; also two small vessels of similar construction having a speed of not less than 16 knots and to cost not to exceed $22,500 each: Provided, That before any vessel provided for in this paragraph shall be purchased or contracted for a vessel of similar construction shall have been constructed complete and of full size for naval warfare and submitted to the Navy Department for such trial and tests as the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, prescribe, and as the result of such tests be demonstrated to have fulfilled all the reasonable requirements of naval warfare for such a vessel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 10, after the word "dollars," to strike out "Provided, That no part of the above appropriation shall be used for the payment of the construction of any collier the total cost of which shall exceed $900,000," so as to make the clause read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and steam machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $22,766,823.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 23, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That a commission is hereby created, to be called "The Commission for Examination into the Business Methods of the Navy Department," to be composed of three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the presiding officer thereof; three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof, three rear-admirals in the United States Navy, not more than two of whom shall be either on the active or retired list of the navy, to be designated by the President; and three civilians, eminent in civil life, to be appointed by the President. Vacancies on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. It shall be the duty of this commission to inquire into and report to Congress, during its next regular session, what changes, if any, are necessary or desirable in the methods of conducting the business of the department, with a view to ascertain what, if any, improvements can be made in the organization and system of said department to secure the best and most economical conditions, and to insure the best preparation, on the part of the Navy of the United States, for any service or emergency that may arise requiring its use and employment. For these purposes they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress at such times as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summons and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, experts, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission is created. The commission may, through subcommittees or otherwise, conduct their work, or any part of it. A sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this section and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission and its members is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available, and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman of said commission by any clerk appointed for that purpose by the commission. And hereafter no part of the public moneys, or of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made by Congress, shall be used for the payment of compensation or expenses of any commission, or any members thereof, unless the creation of such commisison shall have been authorized by Congress.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, my observation teaches me that very little is accomplished by commissions, and they are generally very expensive. I believe that the work set forth here ought to be done by Congress and by the Navy Department. It is the duty of the Navy Department to examine such questions and make such reports to Congress as may be necessary for the purpose of making these improvements. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the proposed amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I am very sorry, Mr. President, that the point has been raised, but the amendment is undoubtedly subject to the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is the end of the bill. There are one or two minor amendments from the committee.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I wish to inquire whether or not the entire section which provides for the commission was stricken from the bill on the point of order?

Mr. HALE. The whole section has gone out on the point of order. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, in line 22, strike out "an emergency" and insert the word "war."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. After line 13, on page 20, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, after line 13, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended for the purchase of torpedoes or appliances or rights pertaining thereto where the rights to such torpedoes or appliances are the subject of pending legal controversy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I think those are the only committee amendments.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee the fact that on page 6, in dealing with the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force at navy-yards, it is provided that those employees shall have a leave of absence of fifteen days. The clause giving them the peremptory right to leave of absence of fifteen days reads as follows:

And that such per diem employees—

Meaning the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force at navy-yards—

may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be granted leave of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional and meritorious cases, where such an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year.

The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee is that I see no reason why the additional leave of fifteen days, in the discretion of the Secretary, because of sickness, to the employees in the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force should be limited to the employees in those special departments. I think if there is to be an additional leave of fifteen days because of sickness, it ought to embrace all, and should not be limited to those in these particular departments.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator an amendment?

Mr. MARTIN. I have an amendment.

Mr. HALE. Will not the Senator offer it?

Mr. MARTIN. I was explaining what I had in mind. Now I will present the amendment. On page 6, line 21, after the word "year," I move to insert:

And that all other employees of navy-yards, gun factories, and naval stations, in addition to the fifteen days' leave of absence now provided for by existing law, may hereafter, in exceptional and meritorious cases, where such employees are ill, be granted sick leaves of absence with pay, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed fifteen days in any one year.

Mr. HALE. I think, if the Senator will allow me, that perhaps he could get at it by less words.

Mr. MARTIN. I suggest in this connection, if it is agreeable to the chairman, that I realize the amendment was hastily prepared and perhaps is not well expressed, but it can easily be straightened out in conference.

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is true. An amendment saying that the like privilege and leave shall be extended to all employees besides those already provided for would cover it.

Mr. MARTIN. I will say to the chairman that I was afraid I might include some who ought not to be included—some temporary employees—so I only gave it to those who already have the fifteen days' leave. I simply add to those having that the fifteen days' sick leave.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection. The Senator is right in his proposition, and the whole matter can be adjusted in conference.

Mr. MARTIN. If the phraseology is not apt it can be corrected in conference.

Mr. HALE. It can be fixed in conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 21, after the word "year," it is proposed to insert:

And that all other employees of navy-yards, gun factories, and naval stations, in addition to the fifteen days' leave of absence now provided for by existing law, may hereafter in exceptional and meritorious cases, where such employees are ill, be granted sick leaves of absence with pay, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, not to exceed fifteen days in any one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLINT. I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be kept, as far as practicable, one-half of the Navy of the United States on the Pacific coast at all times.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reference to the amendment.

When the fleet reached the Pacific coast there was a general demand from the people on the coast that at least a part of the navy should remain there at that time. But it was decided best that the fleet should make the tour of the world, and it will shortly arrive at Hampton Roads. There is now a general demand, not only on the Pacific coast but throughout the Nation, I believe, that a part of the fleet, at least, should be kept on the Pacific coast—a much larger part than has been kept there in past years.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. FLINT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from California means to say that the people on the Pacific coast who want these ships are in favor of this amendment, and the people elsewhere who want to get rid of them are in favor of it?

Mr. FLINT. I think so. I think from what I can understand from talking with people and with Members of both Houses that there is no great desire that the fleet should remain on the Atlantic coast. There is a great desire that the fleet should be on the Pacific coast. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HALE. Why not make it two-thirds?

Mr. FLINT. I would be very glad if the Senator would make it two-thirds. The people on the coast would be delighted with it. I am sure the people on the Atlantic coast would not suffer. They have had the entire fleet for so many years and we have had so few of the vessels that I think it would be only fair that we should have two-thirds of the fleet there.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FLINT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Would half of the fleet on the Pacific coast keep the Japanese out of California?

Mr. FLINT. I think so.

Mr. HALE. I suppose I shall have to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I hope the Senator from Maine will not insist upon the point of order. I submit that the Senator from Maine made a very broad, able, statesmanlike speech this afternoon, in which he conceded that every part of this country should be considered in legislation. He always does that. But I thought he did himself especial credit this afternoon, and I was very much encouraged by what he said. I had hoped that when this amendment should be presented by the Senator from California, as I knew it would be, that the Senator from Maine would accept it.

Mr. President, since the organization of this Government the navy of this country has been once in Pacific waters, and yet we have a great coast line there, greater than the coast line on the Atlantic. We have interests there that are to be conserved and protected which are equally as great as those on the Atlantic coast. Why should not one-half of the fleet, as near as may be, be stationed in Pacific waters? I take it that none of us care to discuss questions that may possibly arise in the future, but I assume equally that everyone knows that if any complication shall possibly arise in the future between this Nation and another it is more likely to grow out of the situation and our relations on the Pacific coast than elsewhere.

It seems to me that this is a very wise suggestion made by the Senator from California, and I hope the Senator from Maine will not insist on his point of order, but will submit it to the Senate. I should like to have the judgment of the Senate on this question. I hope it will be submitted to it, for I should like to know what the judgment of the Senate is as to whether or not the Pacific coast is entitled to the protection of the navy equally with the Atlantic coast. I do not say that, I hope, in any narrow sense; I say it simply from my knowledge of the situation there, and what I believe the necessities require.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of a very large portion of our great navy being stationed and maintained on the Pacific coast. I should advise as a matter of administration at any time, now and hereafter, that, as I have said, a large portion—I am not quite ready to say that half of the fleet; I should want to leave some of that in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy—but building up, as we have, so great a navy of so many ships, I have always been in favor of keeping a very considerable portion of the navy on the Pacific coast; but it is not a question that we can deal with as easily as we did this afternoon with another question.

Mr. FULTON. I admit that.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sees that. To say that with the present accommodations, the present navy-yards, to conduct repairs and all of the incidents that arise in a great naval establishment, we should fix a limit of half of the navy is, I think, going too far. I doubt whether the Senator himself, on reflection, would believe that we ought now to say that in terms. I think that ought to be left largely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. The Senator from Maine will notice that the amendment provides "as far as practicable."

I desire to further say at this time that a great deal of the discussion to-day in reference to navy-yards has made very clear, by the offering of this amendment, the necessity for them on the Pacific coast. The very statement of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that one of the reasons why one-half of the navy could not be maintained upon the Pacific coast is because we lack navy-yards on the Pacific coast, and that a fleet can be maintained on the Atlantic coast, because they have sufficient navy-yards.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator, why not put it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, so that he may see that it is the expression of Congress, in which I will join the Senator?

Mr. FLINT. That is satisfactory. I shall be very glad to accept that modification of the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Now let the amendment be read as proposed to be modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

Mr. BACON. I would inquire of the Senator from Maine whether it ought not to be in the discretion of the President rather than in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy? It seems to me it would be a suggestion of a purpose to pass by the discretion, which properly vests, if there is discretion at all, in the Commander in Chief of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that. It did not occur to me. We generally leave these things to the heads of the departments.

Mr. BACON. I suggest it as a matter which I think is of some importance.

Mr. FULTON. I will say——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Oregon will pardon me for just a moment, I think it is a matter of some importance, while we fully recognize the principle, as was stated by me this afternoon, of our right to direct, whenever we see proper, the disposition of the navy, or any part of it, certainly in time of peace, at the same time I think that where we give a direction and place it within the discretion of an officer, it ought to be the discretion of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection to that. I did not think of that. Let the amendment be read with the insertion of the words "in the discretion of the President."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as proposed to be modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following section:

SEC. 2. That there shall be kept, as far as practicable, in the discretion of the President, one-half of the Navy of the United States on the Pacific coast at all times.

Mr. BACON. I think the words "in the discretion of the President" ought to be transposed. They ought to precede the words "as far as practicable" and not follow them. Otherwise it might be considered that the discretion was simply as to that limitation, and not a broad discretion, which places all within his power.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is very essential; but let the words be transposed.

Mr. BACON. I think they should be transposed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be kept, in the discretion of the President, as far as practicable, one-half of the Navy of the United States on the Pacific coast at all times.

Mr. CLAY. Is not that simply enacting what is the present law? Are we not simply putting into the statute now what is the present law? The President at this time, if I understand it, can keep one-half of the navy on the Pacific coast. He has had practically all of the navy on the Pacific coast during the last six or eight months; and, as I understand the general law, the President of the United States can locate the navy anywhere he wants to.

Mr. HALE. Unless Congress——

Mr. CLAY. Unless Congress has directed otherwise.

Mr. HALE. I take it the object of the Senator from California is that there shall be this—I will not say "mandate"——

Mr. FULTON. Expression.

Mr. HALE. But this expression from Congress that the President in his discretion shall maintain half of the fleet on the Pacific.

Mr. CLAY. You leave it to him if you pass this amendment, but it is left to him now, and it ought to be left to him.

Mr. HALE. This leaves it to him.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I supposed I had the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FULTON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was simply going to ask, if we do not legislate upon this subject at all, can there be any doubt as to its being in the discretion of the President to send a part of the fleet to the Pacific coast?

Mr. HALE. I should say, if the Senator from Oregon will allow me, that the President could do so; but I should rather say that it would strengthen his hands very much if Congress should pass this provision, indicating its approval, and yet leaving it in the discretion of the President. I think it is a good and prudent provision.

Mr. FULTON. I understand the Senator from Maine is willing to accept the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I will not object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], as modified, is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to make an explanation——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Georgia later.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to say that he did not have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to make a statement with reference to an amendment. I have an amendment providing for two ships of the same type as those in the last bill instead of the two provided for in this bill, but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I understand, has an amendment to strike out entirely the ships in this bill and substitute "colliers," as they are called. The proper disposition of the matter would be, of course, to take up his amendment first, but he not being here, I shall hold my amendment a little while in the hope that he may come in later.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment, and I desire to state briefly the reason for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, to come in at the end of page 42, as an amendment to the committee amendment at that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 26, after the word "act," the last word in the committee amendment, it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That the rank of acting assistant surgeon shall carry the like pay and allowances of the rank——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amendment which appears on page 42 went out on a point of order. The whole amendment has gone out.

Mr. BACON. Then, Mr. President, I should like to offer it as a substitute amendment.

Mr. HALE. Of course, as the amendment itself to which the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is intended as an amendment has gone out, to carry out the action of the Senate I should be obliged to make the point of order upon it.

Mr. BACON. I should like for enough of the amendment, or something kindred, to be put in in order that it may go into conference. It is a matter of very considerable importance. I will state the amendment which I have sent to the desk comes from the Navy Department. It comes from the Surgeon-General, at my request that he give the view of the department and the frame of an amendment, if he approved of it. It was not a voluntary communication from him, but in response to a letter which I wrote to him.

Now, if the Senator will permit me to explain it and give the history of it and the reasons for it, then, of course, if the point of order is insisted upon and it is recognized as being under the same liability to exclusion under the point of order as the original amendment, of course I shall not press it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the bottom of page 42 the following:

Provided further, That the rank of acting assistant surgeon shall carry the like pay and allowances of the rank of assistant surgeon; and all dental surgeons shall, after three years' service from the date of their first appointment, if morally, mentally, professionally, and physically qualified, be eligible for permanent appointments as dental surgeons in the United States Navy with the rank of assistant surgeon.

Mr. BACON. I did not know that the amendment to which this is intended as an amendment had been excluded on the point of order, or I should have recast it.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator could recast it.

Mr. BACON. I could not recast it so as to save it from the point of order, but I could have recast it so that it could have stood by itself in case it was permitted to become a part of the bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the Senator explaining the amendment, but I think he sees that, after the action of the Senate in striking out the original provision of the bill, I should be constrained to make the point of order, which, of course, would be fatal. I do not object to the Senator stating, if he chooses, any reasons for the amendment.

Mr. BACON. Of course I do not want to go into an absolutely useless discussion, but my suggestion was that if, without final action by the Senate, there could be enough of an amendment engrafted on the bill for the conference committee to consider it, it might suggest itself to their approval. That is the only suggestion which I now make. Of course, if the Senator does not recognize that, it is useless for me to consume time simply for the purpose of stating that which can produce no result.

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, that as the original provision has gone out, I should have to object to any provision on the same subject coming in now.

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine—because I am not familiar with the subject—whether or not there is now under the existing law a provision for dental surgeons in the navy?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. BACON. None whatever? I very much regret that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I was absent from the Chamber this afternoon, attending to public duty, when the amendment providing for a corps of dental surgeons went out. I did not know it had gone out of the bill, and I want to express my profound regret that the point of order was made against the amendment.

When our fleet reached Sydney, Australia, the dentists of that great city gave a banquet to the dentists of the fleet. One lone dentist appeared. That man is a sailor who has taken care of the teeth of the men who have manned that great fleet that has gone around the world. So far as I know, that man—an enlisted man—is the only dentist in the navy, with the exception of one man who is employed at Annapolis.

It is a reproach that we are in that situation, and it is greatly to the credit of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs that he has attempted in this bill to provide a dental corps. It was not as much of a corps as I would have made it, but it would have consisted of 15 dentists.

As I said before, it is a matter of profound regret to me, knowing something about the profession, that the point of order was made against the amendment, and I hope now, if it is offered when the bill gets into the Senate, that the point of order will not be insisted upon.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, and I wish to echo the wish expressed by him. I think, in the interest of humanity and common comfort to the thousands and tens of thousands of men who as officers and men are now in the American Navy, that there should be a provision under which dental surgeons could be a part of the necessary provision for such purposes in the navy. It can not be anything else but a reproach, and a most serious reproach, that the navy is without such service.

Why, Mr. President, suppose that we who are not in the navy, or suppose that any community was in this day debarred of the services of dentists, what would become of them? Where would be the possible excuse for any such condition of affairs?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that the underlying purpose of this whole agitation about dentists is to have another corps in the navy, with rank and pay and retired pay. The navy has gone on very well in the years past. Every naval ship has a surgeon who knows generally about the health, the digestion, the teeth, and everything else that is likely to come up with reference to the care of the men. The navy has never suffered because there has not been a dental corps. It is the agitation for another corps. It is urged by the Surgeon-General of the Navy, who is perhaps the most persistent man in drumming at Congress early and late for things in his bureau of any man in the Navy Department. I am not content to let it pass that here is a reproach to the navy, and that we are not caring for the men of the navy, when for years and years we have built up the navy, and it has gone on well without a dental corps.

By and by some other branch of practice will want a corps in the navy. I state very plainly and clearly that I am opposed to anything of that kind. We have got now too many corps in the navy, and they only add to the expense of the naval establishment.

Mr. BACON. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire complimentary to the Senator from Maine was based upon a misconception of his attitude.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think not, Mr. President. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, the Senator from Maine, who, I think, drafted this amendment, avoided creating a corps, but he did provide that 15 contract dentists should be employed in the navy. I complimented him upon that.

Mr. BACON. Yes. I think, so far as this amendment is concerned, Mr. President, that it is of infinitely less importance than the original amendment, and my remark was directed, not to the importance of the amendment which I was proposing to offer, so much as it was to the amendment which the committee had offered. Of course, if any provision is made for proper attention to the officers and men of the fleet or of the navy in taking care of the teeth, even though we might not all agree as to whether it was the best provision or not, still it would be a provision which would relieve it from the criticism which I made when I used the expression that we ought to do it in the interest of humanity. But I think that if there is no such provision whatever, it is a reproach to the navy.

The argument of the Senator from Maine, Mr. President, would apply to any reform that has been introduced into the navy, because the time has never been that the American Navy did not, prior to that time, get along very well and acquit itself well in all cases and under all exigencies. I do not think that is any argument, and it does look as a matter lying on the very surface that the reform, if we may so call it, which proposes to care for that essential part of the anatomy of the officers and men of the navy is not to be decried as something which is simply to be regarded as an innovation in the interest of the creation of some particular corps.

I am very much more interested in the accomplishment of the end than I am in the means which may be adopted for such accomplishment. If the Senator from New Hampshire is correct in his understanding of the attitude of the Senator from Maine, that the Senator from Maine is in favor of the amendment offered by the committee, but not in favor of the amendment which I propose, then I would appeal to the Senator to reoffer his amendment or the amendment of the committee and let the navy have at least that much, even if it can not get the amendment which I propose.

Mr. HALE. I can not do that. The amendment has been stricken out on the point of order. I can not reoffer it.

Mr. BACON. Of course the Senator can not do that unless the Senator who made the point of order would forbear to press it. There will be an opportunity when we get into the Senate to again offer that amendment, and while, of course, I think very strong reasons can be urged in favor of the amendment which I propose, I would, in view of the attitude of the Senator from Maine, be willing to withhold that if the committee amendment could again be offered and be adopted.

The suggestion of the Senator from Maine that there are physicians upon ships who care for the health and comfort of the officers and men does not seem to me to meet the requirements. I presume the Senator from New Hampshire, who is himself a physician, will bear testimony to the fact that physicians in the regular practice, those who do not take on the extra profession of dental surgeons, are not themselves in a position to care for the dental requirements of a fleet, and it looks to me as if it amounts almost to a cruelty.

I have forgotten, though it has been stated in the course of this debate, how many officers and men we have now in the navy, but several tens of thousands. It seems to me to be a cruelty to deny in this age to those officers and men the opportunity to have themselves ministered to in this essential particular. Of course, it is not necessary for me to offer the amendment if even the original amendment is not permitted to be considered as part of the bill or accepted as such.

Mr. PENROSE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 69, after the word "parties," in line 25, it is proposed to insert:

And on the two first-class battle ships provided for in this act not more than one shall be built by one contracting party.

Mr. HALE. Is not that in the bill?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, that is not in the bill, although it has always been, as I understand, in previous naval appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. I certainly have no objection to it. Such a provision has always been in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PILES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after line 6, it is proposed to insert:

To complete the marine garrison, navy-yard, Bremerton, Wash., one marine barracks, $150,000, and for officers' quarters, $60,000; in all $210,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, is that estimated for by the department?

Mr. PILES. It is the matter about which I spoke to the Senator. It has all been estimated for, and the $150,000 for the barracks was in the bill as reported to the House, but was there stricken out on a technicality.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I should like here to have an order entered for the totals in the bill to be corrected by the Secretary before it is sent to the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 40.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, after the amendment last agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following:

To construct a road from the city of Las Animas, Colo., to the United States Naval Hospital, near said city of Las Animas, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HALE. I shall have to raise the point of order on that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On what ground?

Mr. HALE. It is clearly a piece of new legislation not reported by any committee and an addition to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 3, in the committee amendment already agreed to, after the word "chapel," insert:

Provided further, That a memorial window may be erected in the Naval Academy chapel by the class of 1895 to the memory of their late classmates, Ensigns Bagley, Breckenridge, Merritt, and Monaghan.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Maine will agree to let the amendment go in. Out of this class of 35, 3 lost their lives in the Spanish war. Merritt went down with the Maine; Bagley lost his life on board the Winslow; Breckenridge lost his life on the torpedo boat Cushing; and Monaghan lost his life in Samoa, all fighting for their country.

These boys have raised the sum of $900, and have it in hand. No appropriation by the Government has been asked for. They simply ask that in memory of these four gallant members of their class they may be allowed to erect a memorial window in the chapel; and I hope the Senator will not raise the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I think perhaps the Senator does not understand that the chapel is intended to have very few and important and significant windows, paintings, or whatever may be there; and it ought not to be subject to smaller memorials which will destroy the whole dignity of the crypt. I sympathize with the feeling of these youths who have raised a few hundred dollars; but I think I must make the point of order that it is an addition to an appropriation, not recommended by any committee. I do not think this great crypt ought to be opened to anything of the kind, however meritorious in itself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment is in contravention of the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, after the words "battle ships," in line 16, strike out the remainder of line 16 and all of lines 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, and insert:

Of the size, maximum displacement, and generally of the type of the two battle ships authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, and in all respects, so far as practicable, like the battle ships Utah and Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. To make the appropriations correspond, I move to add:

At a cost not exceeding, exclusive of armor and armament, $4,500,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the amendment just referred to the words:

At a cost not exceeding, exclusive of armor and armament, $4,500,000.

Mr. MARTIN. The word "each" ought to come after that; else it would be in the aggregate for the two ships. If you omit the word "each," it would be for the two of them.

Mr. HALE. Insert the word "each," then.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the word "each" at the end of the amendment, so as to read: "Four million five hundred thousand dollars each."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 71——

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I should like to have——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HALE. I am simply adapting the appropriations to the amendments just adopted by the Senate.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to ask to have the paragraph in regard to the increase of the navy read as perfected after the two amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CLAPP. It ought to be read.

Mr. McCREARY. I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the paragraph as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

That, for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to have constructed two first-class battle ships of the size, maximum displacement, and generally of the type of the two battle ships authorized by the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, and in all respects, so far as practicable, like the battle ships Utah and Florida, at a cost not exceeding, exclusive of armor and armament, $4,500,000 each.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HALE. I should like to perfect this amendment in the other clause. Then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCREARY. Very well.

Mr. HALE. On page 71, line 9, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "two." That is half a million dollars saved.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, line 9, after the words "twenty-two million," strike out "seven" and insert "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In the next clause, "armor and armament," in lieu of the amount "$12,452,772," insert "$11,952,772." That takes off $500,000.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, lines 15, 16, and 17, strike out "$12,452,772" and insert "$11,952,772."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I am in favor of an adequate navy to meet conditions as they now exist, and I am in favor of authorizing the construction of two battle ships superior in every respect to the fleetest and most powerful on the seas, as provided in the naval appropriation bill now under consideration. Additional battle ships were recommended by the President and by the Secretary of the Navy and by the naval board, of which Admiral Dewey is chairman, and by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, and the bill providing for two battle ships has already passed the House of Representatives. These recommendations are certainly ample and satisfactory.

We have as a Nation great interests, and while other nations have great navies we must be prepared to protect our interests.

We have the defense of our coast line—3,000 miles on the Pacific and a larger number of miles on the Atlantic and on the Gulf. We have the defense of the great canal we are building to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, and we have the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine. We hold the Philippine Islands, which are thousands of miles away, and the distinguished Admiral of the Navy has said that we could not hold these islands six weeks if it were not for the American Navy, and we have other great interests to defend.

Mr. President, the best way to preserve peace under existing conditions is to make the force at the disposal of our Nation so formidable and powerful that the hopelessness of attacking it or its citizens will be apparent and undoubted.

UNITED STATES SECOND NAVAL POWER OF THE WORLD.

Our country now ranks as the second naval power of the world, and we should retain that position.

It is in respect of battle ships and armored cruisers that the best judgment of the comparative strength of the world's navies can be formed.

I obtained from the Navy Year Book of 1908 the following, which is the same as the report made by the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Relative strength of the principal naval powers in battle ships and armored cruisers—built, building, and provided for.

Armored cruisers	3	19,020
Total tonnage		93,320

Only battle ships of 10,000 tons and over are referred to in these comparisons.

The American vessels being built are the Michigan and South Carolina, of 16,000 tons each; the Delaware and North Dakota, of 20,000 tons each; and the Florida and Utah, of 21,825 tons each. These vessels will have from eight to ten 12-inch guns. Their speed will be high—about 21 knots in the case of the four largest vessels.

I do not advocate an appropriation to construct two battle ships in order to put the United States in line with Great Britain, or simply to exceed in battle ships Germany, France, and other nations, or for the purpose of being aggressive, but I advocate two battle ships because I believe we should be prepared for the assertion of our authority and the protection of our interests.

NO WAR CLOUD ABOVE OUR HORIZON.

I do not see any war cloud above our horizon at present, and I hope it will never be necessary again for our Congress to declare war. A great statesman said, "In time of peace prepare for war," and the way to prevent war is to be prepared for war, and the best means of preserving peace is to have such a navy as will show to all would-be assailants that not only peril but defeat will follow declaration of war against the United States.

We had four wars in the last century—in 1812, 1846, 1861, and 1898—and we did not know one year before each of these wars commenced that we would have war. It requires from two to three years to build a battle ship. In this connection I with pleasure say I believe that every American citizen should be proud of the record that has recently been made by our battle ships in the voyage around the world. That trip benefited the officers and the men, improved their discipline, and added to the fame of our navy. It was an announcement to the world that we were a leading naval power. It was a declaration to the world that we were ready and prepared to preserve our rights and protect our interests.

Nations have not yet reached a period where they find it safe to disband their armies and dispense with their navies. In addition to needing our navy for defensive purposes, the great struggle now going on among the nations of the world for supremacy of trade and commerce, in which our nation is participating, may bring contention and friction.

Problems involving racial repulsion and the struggle of two distinct races for equality or supremacy have to be solved. I do not, however, believe that there will be war with Japan. I have abiding confidence in the diplomatic wisdom of our Government and of the Government of Japan, and I believe there will be an amicable settlement of all questions which may arise between Japan and our country.

Japan has a navy about half as large as ours, and has just emerged from a war that caused exhaustion, physically and financially.

Japan has a population about one-half as great as ours. The people are compelled to live close together and cultivate farms that average in area only 3 or 4 acres, and the revenue must necessarily be small. To-day the credit of Japan, the victor, is hardly so good as that of Russia, the defeated.

On our side of the Pacific Ocean Japan has no coal or coaling station. If Japan were to send war ships to our coast on a hostile mission they would be helpless without coal. England alone could be of assistance in that crisis, and our relations with England are such that she would not take sides against us.

I do not believe Japan wants war. Her rulers are wise men. They know what war with our country would mean, and what the result would be. The relations between the United States and Japan are at present cordial and friendly. Both are great powers among the nations of the world. Acting together they can dictate the policies of the Orient and greatly promote commerce and trade. The statesmen of Japan have shown ability of the highest order, and I am not anticipating war with Japan.

THE PEOPLE ARE FOR PEACE.

Mr. President, the sentiment of the people everywhere is for peace, and the feeling in favor of the settlement of international disagreements without war and by arbitration is growing stronger every day. The greatest general movement now among civilized nations is the movement in favor of the settlement of international disagreements by a permanent international arbitration tribunal.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

Arbitration for the settlement of international disputes has been steadily progressing throughout the civilized world. In the last two decades the progress has been wonderful, and in the last decade this progress has been most notable and encouraging. We had the Pan-American Conference held at Washington, authorized by an act of the United States Congress approved May 24, 1888, for the purpose of preserving peace and promoting arbitration for the settlement of international disputes and encouraging reciprocal commercial relations between the Republics of North, South, and Central America. Twenty nations were represented at this conference and pursuant to its authority two other conferences have been held, in the City of Mexico and in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, and another will be held next year at Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic.

The Interparliamentary Union, composed of members of various national parliaments, was organized in 1889 to promote arbitration for the settlement of international disputes. This union has held 15 meetings, the last at Berlin, Germany, in September, last year. Under a resolution of this union President Roosevelt called the second Hague conference.

The International Hague Peace Conference was held in 1899 and 1907, and this conference provided for a permanent court of arbitration.

The Central American Conference was held in 1908, composed of delegates from each of the five republics of Central America; and it provided for a judicial tribunal composed of one judge from each of the Central American republics, to which tribunal all international disputes of the Central American republics are submitted.

Last, but not least, the Senate of the United States has ratified 24 arbitration treaties with the great nations of the world.

It certainly is a source of pleasure to us all that our country took the lead in the first legislation to promote arbitration, and in the first reference of an international disagreement to The Hague tribunal, being the case between the United States and Mexico. Then the United States showed the world its confidence in the great movement by ratifying at the first session of this Congress 12 arbitration treaties, and 12 this session, and both of the great political parties of our country last year in their national platforms indorsed international arbitration.

While arbitration treaties, international conferences, and arbitration courts are being perfected as rapidly as public opinion will permit, the United States should have adequate national armament.

ADEQUATE ARMAMENT AND EFFECTIVE ARBITRATION.

We should have both adequate armament and effective arbitration. In other words, adequate national armament for conditions as they exist, and effective international arbitration wherein all nations may respect each other's vital rights—independence and honor—as set forth in all the arbitration treaties that have been ratified by the Senate, and arbitrate all other differences which can not be settled by diplomacy.

We can not, however, jump immediately to the blessings of perpetual peace brought about by the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. All great achievements are the result of efforts and perseverance, and it takes time to solve important problems, but I hope for the day when Isaiah's prophecy will be fulfilled, and "nation shall not lift the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." What the civilized world needs to promote arbitration is the maintenance of a court composed of able judges, who will have no other occupation, no other interest, and no other aspirations but to consider and decide international questions submitted to them.

THE HAGUE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Perhaps the greatest event of all time in respect to international arbitration was The Hague Peace Conference of 1899, at which 26 nations were represented, and the greatest achievement of that conference was the establishment of a permanent tribunal for the exercise of international functions. Special tribunals had been created before for the decision of particular questions, but a great step was taken when there was substituted a permanent organization always open for the exercise of judicial functions to settle differences between nations. At the second Hague Peace Conference, held in 1907, 44 nations were represented, thus showing the progress and popularity of international arbitration.

RESULTS OF ARBITRATION.

I know there are persons who say internationa arbitration is a captivating theory, but what about results? The results have been great, considering the brief time that international arbitration has been considered and tried.

I shall not take the time of the Senate in the closing hours of the session to enumerate at length. I have already referred to the reference of the disagreement between the United States and Mexico, which was arbitrated satisfactorily to both nations by The Hague arbitration court.

The dispute between the United States and Venezuela has recently, by arrangement made by a special commissioner authorized to represent the United States, been referred to The Hague Arbitration Court for settlement, and the United States Senate has recently ratified an agreement between the United States and Great Britain for the submission to the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague of questions relating to the fisheries on the north Atlantic coast, and according to published statements Holland and Venezuela have recently agreed to submit their disagreement, which at one time was about to result in war, to The Hague Arbitration Court.

Other nations have submitted their disagreements to The Hague Arbitration Court, but I must not take time to refer to but one other arbitration.

Peace and arbitration were appreciated in the Republics of Argentina and Chile. They warred with each other for years, but they felt the spirit of the present age and proved that peace hath victories more renowned than war, and they laid aside their arms, referring their disagreement to arbitration, and then erected a statue of Christ, the Prince of Peace, cast from part of the cannon with which they had fought, and placed the statue on the heights of the Andes on the boundary line between the two countries, as fixed by arbitral judgment, and on the statue is this inscription:

Sooner shall these mountains crumble to dust than Argentinians and Chileans break the peace, which at the feet of Christ the Redeemed they have sworn to maintain.

CIVILIZATION, PROGRESS, AND CHRISTIANITY DEMAND ARBITRATION.

Mr. President, civilization, progress, and Christianity demand the settlement of international disagreements by arbitration, without resorting to war with its more deadly and destructive guns and other arms than were ever known before. It is clear that wars are being avoided at the present time by international arbitration, and as the years roll by more and more war will be averted by arbitration and the people will bow in obedience to God's word: "On earth peace, good will toward men."

The relation between armaments and arbitration is significant. Armaments increase with disputes and danger, arbitration increases with peace and security. As the area of international arbitration is extended there will be increased peace and security which will be sure to warrant the decrease of armaments. National weakness invites war; military and naval strength advance peace and arbitration. If our country had no army and no navy and was not known to be formidable in war, we would not be an important factor in the great problem of arbitration for the settlement of international disputes.

The advocates of disarmament have only to look to China to see an object lesson which should convince them of their error. This most populous nation on the globe was about to become the prey of certain nations, and only the disinterested friendship of the United States and one other nation prepared for fighting have preserved China from dismemberment.

Mr. President, I have already consumed more time than I intended. I will close by saying I am heartily in favor of the provision in the bill for two battle ships, because I believe we should provide for adequate armament to protect us against aggressions, and at the same time strive for effective arbitration wherein all nations will respect each other's territory and sovereignty and arbitrate all other questions.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk for the Senator from Delaware [Mr. du PONT].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 23, it is proposed to insert:

The pay and allowances of the secretary to the Admiral of the Navy shall be the same as those of a lieutenant on the active list having an equal length of service.

Mr. HALE. I think that is the only officer who was left out last year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 of the bill it is proposed to strike out, after the word "navy" in line 18 to the end of the paragraph, in the following words:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation for powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade nor to any corporation having a monopoly of the manufacture and supply of gunpowder in the United States, except in the event of war.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will not be done, but I do not care to debate it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. President, I am not here as the defender of trusts or unlawful combinations. I offer this amendment on behalf of several thousand of my constituents, upon whom I fear Congress is unwittingly likely to perpetrate a great wrong.

This provision seems to me to be punitive in its nature, but the punishment is destined to fall upon innocent people. Proceedings are now pending in the United States court to determine whether or not the corporation commonly known as the "powder trust" is an unlawful combination and conspiracy. If the Government is successful, the corporation will be dissolved. If the defendant wins, there will be no trust.

In either case it seems to me that Congress can with great propriety await the result of the suit.

The facts, as I gather them from reading the debates in the House upon the subject, are practically:

I. The total requirements of the Government are about 3,000,000 pounds.

II. Of this amount the government factory at Indianhead can supply about 1,000,000 pounds.

III. Through the operation of the factory at Indianhead the Government is enabled to familiarize itself with all the details of manufacture, and in that way is able to prepare specifications to be used by outside manufacturers and to determine with accuracy the actual cost of manufacture in both government and private plants.

IV. Based upon this knowledge and the report of the Joint Army and Navy Board, the price to be paid by the Government has been fixed at 64 cents per pound.

It would appear from the above facts that the interests of the Government are amply protected. My interest in it, however, arises from the fact that there are in the State of New Jersey five factories for the manufacture of powder which will be affected by it.

The number of employees in the various works is approximately 2,000. Upon the basis ordinarily used, this would represent a population of 10,000, who are dependent upon these works for their livelihood. A powder factory is usually considered an undesirable neighbor, and for this reason is isolated from other factories. The villages which grow up around them are at a distance from other sources of employment, and these employees are peculiarly dependent upon this industry.

A cessation of work would be a serious blow to these communities and cause great annoyance, distress, and possibly suffering to the inhabitants. In view of the fact that it is not judicially determined that a trust or combination in restraint of trade exists, that the powder is made under government specifications and inspection, and that the price is fixed by the bill, I appeal to the Senate on behalf of these innocent people of the State of New Jersey that this injustice shall not be committed and that this amendment shall prevail.

Mr. CLAPP. I merely wish to make one observation. If the court dissolves this organization, there will be no trust; and, as the Senator says, if the court says there is no trust, then there is nothing for this prohibition to apply to. So I can not for the life of me see how we are injuring anybody by this proviso.

Mr. BRIGGS. If the court should take a year or a year and a half to determine the question, there may be in the meantime a great deal of distress.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I wish to say a word before the motion to strike out is put. I intended to offer an amendment, as I suggested yesterday, if the chairman of the committee did not. From the discussion yesterday it was obvious to me that this proviso prohibiting the purchase of powder from a trust applied to a very small part of the powder that we bought. If this is a good thing, it is a joke to have it include only 10 per cent, as I recall some one stated, of the powder that we buy. If it is a good thing, let us make it mean something and amend it in accordance with the suggestion which I made yesterday, so as to make the proviso read:

That no part of any appropriation made in this act for the purchase of powder shall be paid to any trust or combination in restraint of trade nor to any corporation, etc.

As it is, it reads, "That no part of this appropriation;" it was admitted yesterday that it would apply only to this particular $5,528,000, of which only a very small portion was spent for powder, and it does not include the appropriation made in the next paragraph and also in the paragraph on page 19.

It seems to me before we enter on a discussion on the question of striking out the whole matter, we ought at least to consider an amendment like that making it include all the powder. I suggested it yesterday in the running debate, and I thought very possibly the chairman of the committee would perfect it.

Mr. HALE. No; I expected the Senator would offer the amendment. I shall not raise any objection to it. But we might as well vote first on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, and then the Senator from Nebraska can move his amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. Very well. If that is the wish, I will withhold the amendment until the vote on the proviso is taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment may again be stated.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senate is prepared to strike out the proviso.

Mr. DANIEL. "In the event of an emergency" is the language here employed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That has been changed, upon motion of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Maine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. DANIEL. It has been stated in the debate that the House added a large appropriation in this bill—I do not remember the amount——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. DANIEL. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, if I am correctly informed. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine where the amendment is in the bill, as I have been unable to identify it; and what is the amount?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will look at the debates in the House, he will find that part of the transaction there was increasing the appropriation $250,000 and inserting the words "enlargement of;" so that $250,000 additional was appropriated for the enlargement of the government factory.

Mr. DANIEL. If we were acting on the action of the House, we would have it in this bill in that fashion.

Mr. HALE. It is in the bill.

Mr. DANIEL. All I ask is to know where it is in the bill. I do not see it.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will look at the provision at the beginning, he will find the words to be for the "enlargement of."

Mr. DANIEL. I see that.

Mr. HALE. And the general appropriation for all of these purposes is increased $250,000. It does not show in terms the $250,000, because it was moved in addition to the general sum. But that was enlarged, as the word "enlargement" was inserted by the House.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no doubt that is the understanding of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. That is undoubtedly it.

Mr. DANIEL. It would naturally be imagined by anyone who knew the history of this provision, but the history of this provision is no part of the provision itself. I call attention to the fact that all of these items about the Bureau of Ordnance are very obscure as to their effect. I will read a little, in order that I may indicate that to the Senate.

Under the head of "Ordnance and ordnance stores," the appropriation is:

First, for procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material.

Second, for the armament of ships.

Third, for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department.

Fourth, for furniture at naval magazines, torpedo stations, and proving ground.

Fifth, for the maintenance of the proving ground.

Sixth, and maintenance and enlargement of powder factory.

Seventh, and for target practice.

Eighth, and for pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy-yards, naval stations, and naval magazines:

"Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy-yards, naval stations, and naval magazines," etc., "shall not exceed $398,890.28."

There is a stop where I suppose there should be a semicolon.

Then come the words:

"In all, $5,528,171.99."

I now call the attention of the Senator from Maine, and of the Senate, too, to the fact that this appropriation has but one specific limitation. That is that the appropriation for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service shall not exceed $398,890.28. All the balance, which means all above the sum of $398,890.28 up to $5,528,171.99, is to be distributed, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for these eight different items of appropriation; so, when the Senate shall pass the bill, they will not know, nor can any man tell, what they have done with respect to an appropriation in aid of the powder factory which they propose to promote and to build and complete.

I shall not speak on this subject, Mr. President, except for two or three minutes. But I wish to impress, if I may, in some degree upon the Senate the importance of vigorous, clear, distinct, and aggressive action against the enormous trust in this country which, according to the testimony laid before both the House and the Senate, is drawing money out of the Treasury of the United States in large amounts for powder. It is an absolutely indispensable necessity to this country, if it intends to be ready to defend itself, to provide ample powder magazines, and not to permit an open, notorious, and well-advertised monopoly, which is not only continental, but cosmopolitan and almost world-wide in its operations, to keep its hand in the Treasury of the United States and to mulct the people of this country for the munitions of defense.

In order to avoid loss of time I shall ask permission to insert a letter addressed to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, which has been printed and circulated, from Mr. R. S. Waddell, who has been largely engaged in the manufacture of powder in Peoria, Ill. I heard the testimony of this gentleman before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate nearly three years ago. It was clear; he was fully examined; and he made good his assertions. It was as the result of his testimony that an amendment relative to powder for the army was put on an appropriation bill in this body, which was increased to $165,000 by the House, and which started this reform which is now moving on, to consummate something in preparing this country to equip itself for defense.

There is under this bill a limit of 64 cents that we may pay for powder. According to testimony which I think has been put before both bodies, powder can be produced for a much less amount than that. It is said that the department here can fix the price of powder. It is shown in this paper that by an agreement between the American end of the trust and the European end of the trust the American trust has the power reposed in it to fix the price of powder; and in so far it has been, if not quite, at all events getting nearly exactly the price that it fixes upon the powder.

I do not think this provision is aggressive enough, is full enough, or is clear enough in its operation.

I do not know that we can do better. We never will do better until this matter is thoroughly understood, and until every element of the public service in this country, both administrative and legislative, is roused up to make as liberal appropriations as possible to build and complete powder factories for both army and navy which will rest our defense upon a firm and secure foundation.

I will not read the different items of testimony which are brought forth in this paper; but I ask that it may be printed with my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The paper referred to is as follows:

The honorable the WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In the matter of the tariff schedules on explosives, I desire to submit a few reasons why explosives should be placed upon the free list.

First. Because a protective tariff is wholly unnecessary.

Second. For the reason that it is harmful to the people and the Government and is of no benefit to the American manufacturers.

Third. The American Powder and Dynamite Trust by its unlawful acts against the Government has forfeited all right to federal protection.

Waiving all discussion of the willful violation by the Powder Trust, of state and national laws prohibiting monopolies in restraint of trade within the United States. I invite your attention to a few extracts copied from the "World Agreement" fixing prices, restraining trade and dividing the markets of the world between the American and European explosives trusts, with our comments thereon. The extracts from the international contract are in black-face type and our comments follow each quotation.

This agreement was made in October, 1897, for a long term of years and to continue indefinitely thereafter from year to year until six months' notice of intended termination is given.

The "common (or slush) fund" is now on hand, undivided, and available for use.

Agreement made this 26th day of October, 1897, between:
Messrs. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., of Wilmington, Del.;
Laflin & Rand Powder Company, of New York City;
Eastern Dynamite Company, of Wilmington, Del.;
The Miami Powder Company, of Xenia, Ohio;
The American Powder Mills, of Boston, Mass.;
The Aetna Powder Company, Chicago, Ill.;
The California Powder Works, of San Francisco, Cal.;
The Giant Powder Company (Consolidated), of San Francisco, Cal.;
The Judson Dynamite and Powder Company, of San Francisco, Cal.
(Hereinafter collectively referred to as the "American factories" of the one part), and
The Vereinigte Koln-Rottweiler Pulverfabriken, of Cologne;
The Nobel-Dynamite Trust Company (Limited), of London.
(Hereinafter collectively referred to as "the European factories") of the other part.

Whereas the parties hereto own or control a large number of companies and works engaged in the manufacture and trade of explosives, and

Whereas it has been deemed advisable to make arrangement so as to avoid anything being done which would affect injuriously the common interest.

It has therefore been agreed as follows:

The word "explosives" in this agreement is to be understood as including detonators, black powder, smokeless sporting powder, smokeless military powder, and high explosives of all kinds.

A list of all the companies and factories controlled by the American factories, directly or indirectly, is to be prepared and handled by Messrs E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., in duplicate to the European factories at the time of the execution of this agreement, and the European factories are to hand to Messrs. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. a complete list of the companies controlled by them, directly or indirectly, when executing this agreement.

The lists exchanged show dozens of manufacturing corporations, both American and European, not mentioned in the agreement, but all parties in the world trust.

It embraces a complete monopoly in the United States of black sporting and rifle powders; black military, ordnance, and saluting powders; smokeless ordnance and military powders; more than 99 per cent of smokeless sporting powders; all fuse powders; more than 95 per cent of dynamite and other high explosives; all detonators for firing high explosives; and more than 95 per cent of the blasting and mining powders manufactured and consumed in the United States. The chief exception is the trivial amount of smokeless ordnance powder made by the navy at Indianhead plant and by the army at its miniature plant, Dover, N. J., scarcely enough for current target practice.

Of nearly a million pounds black military and sporting powders made per year in the United States, this Du Pont trust produces all and fixes the price, with a net profit of 150 per cent.

Foreign competition is prohibited. Domestic competition impossible.

The American factories bind themselves not to erect factories in Europe, and the European factories undertake not to erect any factory in the United States of America.

Whenever the American factories receive an inquiry from any Government other than their own, either directly or indirectly, they are to communicate with the European factories, through the chairman appointed, as hereinafter set forth, and by that means to ascertain the price at which the European factories are quoting or have fixed, and they shall be bound not to quote or sell at any lower figure than the price at which the European factories are quoting or have fixed. Should the European factories receive an inquiry from the Government of the United States of North America, or decide to quote for delivery for that Government, either directly or indirectly, they shall first in the like manner ascertain the price quoted or fixed by the American factories and shall be bound not to quote or sell below that figure.

The American powder and dynamite trust is hereby authorized and empowered to fix the price to be charged the Federal Government for smokeless ordnance and military powders and for dynamite and other high explosives for the Panama Canal. Competition is eliminated and the power of the Du Pont trust is supreme.

Should independent competition develop in this country, two-thirds of an enormous common fund, contributed by the wealthiest monopoly in the world, is available for its destruction.

The Du Pont trust has claimed that the joint army and navy board fixed the price of ordnance smokeless powder. By this agreement the Du Pont trust fixes the price. This caused the Government to pay 75 cents, and it now pays 69 cents per pound for powder that costs 32 cents to manufacture.

From this execution of this world agreement in 1897 up to date the president of the Du Pont trust has continuously served as the "American chairman." His duties and powers are later defined.

Here follows the division of the markets of the world, including all this side of Mars and other celestial bodies:

"It is agreed that the United States of North America, with their present or future Territories, possessions, colonies, or dependencies, the Republics of Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica, as well as the Republics of the United States of Colombia and Venezuela, are to be deemed the exclusive territories of the American factories and are hereafter referred to as 'American territory.' All the countries in South America not above mentioned, as well as British Honduras and the islands in the Caribbean Sea, which are not Spanish possessions, are to be deemed common territory, hereinafter referred to as 'syndicated territory;' the rest of the world is to be the exclusive territory of the European factories, hereinafter referred to as 'European territory.'

"The American factories are to abstain from manufacturing, selling, or quoting, directly or indirectly, in or for consumption in any of the countries of the European territory, and the Europeans are to abstain in like manner from manufacturing, selling, or quoting, directly or indirectly, in or for consumption in any of the countries of the American territory. With regard to the syndicated territory neither party are to erect works there, except by a mutual understanding, and the trade there is to be carried on for joint account in the manner hereinafter defined.

"The American factories shall forthwith designate in writing a chairman and vice-chairman, who shall hold office as such until their respective successors shall be appointed by the party of the first part, and such chairman, or in his absence such vice-chairman, shall be the authorized representative of the American factories, to whom and through whom all communications, acts, and transactions in respect to this agreement, unless otherwise stipulated, shall be had; and the European factories shall likewise forthwith designate in writing a chairman and vice-chairman, to whom shall be referred all matters which by terms of this contract are made referable to the chairman representing the European factories. The said chairmen or vice-chairmen shall jointly establish rules for the carrying out of the syndicate arrangements hereinafter referred to.

"The chairmen shall, from time to time, mutually agree upon a basis price for each market in the syndicated territory, such basis price to include cost of manufacture, freight, insurance, landing charges, magazine charges, and all other charges until delivery, including agency commission and the contribution toward the common fund hereinafter stipulated.

"The chairmen shall likewise fix a selling price for each market, which is to be deemed a convention price, below which no sales are to be effected, and the difference between the basis price and the selling price is to be deemed the syndicate profit and to be divided in equal shares between the American factories and the European factories."

After deducting the American territory and the syndicated, or pooled, territory, the "rest of the world" is the exclusive territory of the European factories.

Please note the American factories are to abstain from manufacturing, selling, or quoting in the "European territory," and the Europeans are to abstain in like manner from manufacturing, selling, or quoting, directly or indirectly, in or for consumption in any of the countries of the "American territory." This portion of the agreement is strictly enforced at the present time.

It is wholly unnecessary to protect the American manufacturers with a tariff when they have so completely protected themselves by contract. The Du Pont trust is superior to the tariff, as well as all other laws.

Should independent factories develop in Europe and desire business in this country, why should Congress deny the American consumers the privilege of protecting themselves against the greed of the Du Pont trust by purchasing abroad and without the payment of tariff charges?

The American powder trust has ample protection in the enormous "common fund" contributed by the foreign and domestic trusts, two-thirds of which is available for the destruction of American commerce that comes in competition with this world monopoly.

Please note the "syndicated territory" and the method of fixing prices, restricting trade, and the division of profits between the American and foreign powder trusts. This method is in effective operation to-day, regardless of the expiration date of written contracts. The world trade was divided and the contract results remain in statu quo.

THE COMMON SYNDICATE OR SLUSH FUND.

"A common syndicate fund is to be constituted by a payment of $1 per case of 75 per cent dynamite, or per case gelignite, gelatin dynamite, or blasting gelatin, and a payment of such portion of $1 as the percentage of nitroglycerin in lower grade dynamites bears to 75 per cent until such fund reaches the amount of $50,000, when the contribution is to be reduced to one-half the above-mentioned rates.

"The syndicate accounts, according to clause 10, made up to 31st December in each calendar year, are to be handed in by both parties, so as to reach the chairman of the other party by the 15th April next ensuing, and the payments for the balance are to be made by the 30th June following, when the amount contributed to the common fund shall likewise be paid.

"The common fund shall, as the chairmen may decide, be invested in government securities, and it is from this fund that any fine or fines hereinafter stipulated, not recovered from the parties, shall be taken. It shall likewise be admissible for the chairmen to dispose of two-thirds of the common fund for the purpose of protecting the common interest against outside competition.

"Any breach of this agreement shall be adjudicated upon by the chairmen, and if they can not agree they shall appoint an umpire. For the guidance of the chairmen and umpire it is agreed that, should either of the parties erect factories in a country reserved to the other, the liquidated damages shall not be fixed lower than £10,000.

"Should either party trade in the territory of the other, it shall be admissible for the chairmen to absolve them of any accidental breach, but if an intentional breach shall be proved, the fine shall be the invoice value of the goods supplied. No restriction is placed on the decision of the chairmen as to the penalty to be imposed for intentional underselling in one of the markets of the syndicate territory."

There has not been a single independent competitor of this American powder trust within the United States during the past ten years that has not felt the blighting force, directly or indirectly, of this common fund. All have been its victims. The destructive methods of the American trust have been sufficient to blight competition in this country, but when to this is added the contributions of the wealthy European factories, through the common fund, for the elimination of competition, it is a marvel how any competitor has survived.

The enormous proportions of this common fund may be judged by two items:

The United States Government places orders frequently for lots of eight and ten million pounds of 75 per cent nitroglycerin dynamite for the Panama Canal. Ten million pounds means 200,000 cases. At $1 per case this would net $200,000. At 50 cents, the minimum per case, the contribution on this sigle order would net a payment of $100,000 into the common fund. A single shipment, oft repeated, from European factories to South Africa would contribute a larger sum to the common fund; yet these are only two points of activity in the great markets of the world.

An independent manufacturer of explosives in the United States with this great organized combination of foreign and American monetary interests against him has about as much chance to survive as a snowball in—the Tropics.

Why should the patriotic representatives of the American people protect this gigantic powder monopoly with a tariff at the expense of their constituents?

The present tariff on blasting powder is 4 cents per pound, or $1 per keg. In Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and throughout the Middle West the powder trust now fixes the delivered price of this article at $1.10 per keg and supplies most of the trade at $1.

The freight rate from the seaboard will average 20 cents per keg. The manufacturing cost varies from 80 to 90 cents per keg at mills.

Think of a protective tariff of a dollar per keg on an article that sells inland for a dollar; which costs at the seaboard 90 cents to import and 20 cents freight cost to deliver. This powder for the past five years has all been sold at from 90 to 95 cents, until the larger independent companies were ruined and absorbed (my own company among others), when the present list was established.

Please note that if the European trust should sell in this country at any price the offending company is fined the full "invoice value of the goods supplied" and if it fails to pay the fine, it is paid out of the "common fund." Free trade would be futile in securing competition. A protective tariff is ridiculous.

"With regard to the markets in the European territory in which the American factories have already done business, and from which, in accordance with the stipulations of this agreement, they are to retire, as well as the markets of the American territory in which the European factories have already done business, and from which they are, according to the stipulations of this agreement, to retire, the following is agreed:

"Agents are as far as possible to be retained by the party who is henceforward to do the business in the market in question.

"Magazines are in a like manner to be taken over at their present value, to be determined by mutual agreement or arbitration.

"Stocks, if in good merchantable condition, are to be taken over at full cost, i. e., the amount which the goods at present cost with accumulated charges.

This agreement is to be in force for ten years, beginning from the 15th of July, 1897, subject to written notice being given six months prior to the 15th of July, 1907. In the absence of notice this agreement is to continue thereafter from year to year until such six months' notice of intended termination is given.

Settlements have been made annually for many years between the American and European chairmen under this world agreement. It is still in full force and effect and will remain so for years, with some variations made by the chairmen, to avoid technical complaints and proofs; the trade of the districted territories is restrained, and the common fund is undistributed.

Was not this world agreement a willful violation of both the civil and criminal laws of our country, prohibiting monopolies, the fixing of prices, and the restraint of trade?

Courts may dissolve and enjoin the present form of this world monopoly; it will only change its chameleon hue and continue in efficient operation.

"You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

No independent powder manufacturer, possessing a full knowledge of the situation, would desire a protective tariff on explosives.

Their production is limited to blasting powder and dynamite, and the powder trust fixes a ruinously low price on these, depending for its rich revenues on the support of the United States Government, through its excessive price and liberal and exclusive purchases of ordnance and military smokeless powders, and dynamite for the Panama Canal.

A protective tariff is not necessary either on blasting powder or dynamite. There is no competition in the United States with the Du Pont trust on black rifle, sporting, and military powders, nor on smokeless sporting, ordnance, and military powders. On these the American trust enjoys a complete monopoly and is amply protected from foreign competition by its world agreement.

We therefore respectfully protest against any protective tariff on explosives and request, in behalf of the consumers of this country, that explosives be placed upon the free list.

The Congress and the President will need no interpreter to point with pride to the glowing patriotism and scrupulous fidelity of the du Pont trust, as exemplified in its compact with foreign trusts to corner the markets of the world against the United States Government.

Its successful efforts in fixing an extortionate price and the elimination of all competition, foreign and domestic, in the supply of ordnance smokeless powder for national defense, are earnestly commended for the thoughtful consideration of those in Washington who have been the stalwart friends of the powder trust.

A careful perusal of this "world agreement" will disclose why our navy powder was tested in the guns of foreign nations, disclosing its quality and ballistic properties, and why the du Pont trust built the factory in Brazil to manufacture American navy powder for use in foreign guns.

It is a matter of regret that the War and Navy departments and the Congress have not taken concerted action to break this unholy alliance with the du Pont powder trust and establish government plants of adequate capacity to conserve the public welfare.

Our patriotism should be broad enough and of a quality to freely grant protection to all American industries that need it. It should be vital enough to resent every successful combination with foreigners to "hold up" the United States Government for private mercenary purposes.

For the edification of the Congress I will be pleased to furnish a certified copy of this "world powder trust agreement," if it is desired.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT S. WADDELL,
President Buckeye Powder Company.

PEORIA, ILL., January 13, 1909.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course I do not mean to prejudge any case that is now pending in court, but people who are in suit have the right to be judged according to the charges and the testimony produced in that suit. Nearly every assertion that I have made here rests on testimony independent of that suit, and has proceeded from the mouths of witnesses before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and from the testimony of witnesses (Mr. Waddell being the chief one on the side I am now advocating) before the Appropriations Committee, before which General Crozier also appeared. But if anyone wishes to look at a more minute statement of the constituent elements of this trust he will find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this year, page 1252, in the proceedings of the House, to which I refer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURKETT. I move to amend the bill on page 17, line 19, by striking out the word "this" and inserting "any;" by striking out the word "for" after the word "appropriation" and inserting the words "made in this act for the purchase of."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, in line 19, strike out the word "this" and insert the word "any," and after the word "appropriation" strike out the word "for" and insert "made in this act for the purchase of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If no amendment is proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BACON. I propose, when the bill gets in the Senate, to offer an amendment. I do not understand that I have to make any special reservation for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. It has not yet gone to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I did not misunderstand that. I do not understand that I have to make any special reservation in order to do that.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to offer an amendment. After the words "ninety-nine cents" on page 17, line 8, I move to insert "of which not less than $250,000 shall be expended for the enlargement of the Government powder factory."

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that, but it is not needed at all. However, it is all right. It does not change the situation. Let us have a vote, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I understand that under the head "Increase of the navy" an amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] was adopted, restricting the appropriation to two first-class battle ships, at a cost not exceeding, exclusive of armor and armament, $4,500,000 each. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk, to strike out the entire paragraph regarding the battle ships, including the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, and to insert.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 68, under the heading "Increase of the navy," strike out all of the paragraph as amended and insert:

That for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the naval establishment of the United States, the President is authorized to have constructed such auxiliary ships, including transports, colliers, dispatch-boats, cruisers, and scouts as will be necessary in case of war to support the fighting ships, at a total cost not exceeding $9,000,000; and that the President make such recommendation to Congress as to him seems advisable regarding the manning of vessels belonging to such auxiliary navy, in whole or part, by the naval reserve and the leasing of them so manned in times of peace to shipping companies for the purpose of promoting foreign trade and commerce.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, under the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] I understand the appropriation in this bill is reduced about $3,000,000.

Mr. CLAPP. I will say to the Senator from Nevada it is reduced about $5,000,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. About $5,000,000?

Mr. CLAPP. I think it will amount to about $5,000,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The total amount under the bill is reduced only $3,000,000. The appropriation called for by the bill was $12,000,000, and the Senator's amendment reduces it to $9,000,000.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; but in the additional appropriation necessary to equip the ships I think the Senator will find there is a difference of about $5,000,000.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand, then, that the Senator refers to the future armor and armament of these ships, which, of course, would be very much less expensive than the ships provided for by the bill as it came from the committee.

As to that, I understand that the preliminary appropriation made for these battle ships is about 50 or 60 per cent of the total cost after the armor and armament are added, and that if this appropriation as reported by the committee should stand at $12,000,000, it would mean that subsequently we should be compelled to appropriate $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 more for the armament necessary to make them complete. And so, with reference to the appropriation of $9,000,000, I assume that if these battle ships stand in the bill we will be called upon to appropriate in the future nearly $9,000,000 more for their armor and armament.

Mr. President, my amendment provides, as a substitute for these battle ships, for the construction of ships of the auxiliary navy—scouts, transports, colliers, and dispatch boats, which, according to the report of the Navy Department, are absolutely essential to maintain the fighting ships and support them in case of war. Some years ago the War Board of the Navy Department was called upon to state what auxiliary ships would be necessary in case our colonial possessions were threatened; and the War Board made an elaborate report, showing that about 232 ships, of an average capacity of 6,500 tons, would be required for this purpose. These ships, I imagine, would cost about $1,000,000 each. It is admitted that our merchant marine will not furnish these ships; that our merchant marine is entirely inadequate; that whilst the main purpose of a navy is really to protect a merchant marine, we have practically none, and the main purpose of our navy seems to be to protect the phantom ships of a nonexistent navy.

We have, therefore, no merchant marine to protect; but we have a coast to defend, and we have insular possessions to protect. The War Board tells us that it will be necessary for us to have 232 auxiliary ships of various forms for this purpose. It seems to be admitted that in case war broke out the laws of neutrality would prevent foreign countries from supplying us with such ships. It therefore seems absolutely essential that we should provide such ships as a part of the auxiliary navy.

For some years I have been calling attention to this matter. I first called attention to it upon this floor in 1906, again in 1907, and again in 1908. Then I was fortunate enough to arrest the attention of the Senator from Maine. I do not propose to repeat at length the arguments which I indulged myself in upon those various occasions. I propose to quote mainly from the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], whose knowledge of the navy and its requirements no man can question.

In the debate of 1908 upon the ship-subsidy bill, whilst I was addressing the Senate on that subject and insisting that, instead of entering upon this vast scheme of ship subsidy, which would fill our corridors with importunate companies demanding subsidy and continually demanding increases, it would be wise for us to build a portion of this auxiliary navy and utilize it during the period of peace as training ships for our naval reserve, manned by the naval reserves, to use these ships under lease to private companies in advancing the trade of this country and the transporting of American products and American mails to ports in Africa, South America, Australasia, and Asia, to which we had at that time no access.

Whilst I was indulging in that course of argument, that such ships would be useful as a part of the navy itself, and the expenditure would be justified in making them a part of the navy, and would also aid us in the promotion of trade and commerce with foreign countries, the Senator from Maine interrupted me, and I will quote what he said:

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interfere with the line of the Senator's argument, but I am very largely in sympathy with him, for he has struck what is the weak point in our entire naval establishment, so far as ships are concerned. We are deplorably lacking in the essentials that make a great fleet not only formidable, but seaworthy.

The Senator said the other day, and the metaphor was not too strong, that without certain auxiliary ships the great battle ships of the United States fleet upon any waters outside of our own waters, in case of any emergency, with war threatened, would be derelicts, and it is too true.

In another place the Senator said:

Mr. President, it is a melancholy spectacle that this great fleet of ours in this regard presents to-day. It is the greatest fleet of great and formidable ships that the whole world has ever seen. It is completely manned. It is in every respect except one the most magnificent and formidable fleet of ships that any nation has ever put upon the waters of the globe.

Admiral Converse, who knows it, root and branch, has so told us, and he is right. But this great fleet, which has been sent upon its voyage around the globe, is to-day absolutely dependent upon its motion, upon its existence as a moving fleet, on the indulgence of foreign powers.

The Senator then went on to show the number of foreign colliers which we had been compelled to employ on that famous cruise in order to furnish the ships with transports that were required; which numbered some 27, with tonnage varying from 4,500 to 6,000 tons. The Senator then added:

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if when that fleet was ordered on this tour about the globe there had been the least menace of war from any power, no government owning one of these foreign colliers would have allowed a single ship to be employed by us, and our fleet, magnificent as it is, with any menace of war upon the sky, without these foreign colliers would be as useless and—

"As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean."

We do not realize this, Mr. President. I go further. If any complication should arise in the voyage of the ships, any danger, any menace of war in a foreign power, I do not know but that every foreign power represented in the ships which we have hired would feel compelled to withdraw them from the association of the fleet, and we would be hung up.

It is not, Mr. President, an agreeable thing to contemplate. We go on year after year building up and accumulating these immense ships at an enormous expenditure, and find ourselves, as we would in any emergency for which the ships are built, without a thing being done that makes the ships formidable as a fleet at sea. The Senator is right in his theories. There ought not to be another ship added to the American Navy until we add something that every other power has done to make the ships formidable in case of an emergency.

My colleague is right; the Senator from New Hampshire is right; we can not do it here. I do not think the Senator from Nevada wants to embarrass this bill—

That was the ship subsidy bill—

but when we come to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill I hope the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maine, my colleague, and every thoughtful, patriotic Senator will join me to try and see that something is done in this entirely neglected field that we have rashly and in the most foolhardy way neglected and abandoned in the past. Otherwise, Mr. President, if there is any call for the big ships, and they are to protect us in case of possible war, they are absolutely worthless unless we have something with which to build up an auxiliary fleet and to supply the ships that will enable them to move in the waters of the globe. Without these foreign ships, these colliers, Mr. President, we not only could not have gotten around Cape Horn, but we could not have gotten beyond the Caribbean Sea. Nobody has seemed to realize that. But when we come to the naval appropriation bill this matter will be laid before the Senate, and we will be made to consider what are the actual needs of the American Navy.

Mr. President, later on the naval appropriation bill was reported to the Senate. The bill as received from the House contained, if I recollect aright, an appropriation for two colliers. To this the Senate amendment added three colliers, making five in all. When that bill came before the Senate, I referred in my remarks upon the subject to this result as a very lame and impotent conclusion; and I read, as I have read to-night, certain extracts from the speech of the Senator from Maine, in which he most clearly and most forcibly pointed out the needs of our country for this auxiliary navy. To my criticism the Senator from Maine replied:

So far as concerns the equipment of our fleet with colliers, the most important subject—

As I understand it, the Senator regarded it as the most important subject then under consideration—the bill as reported by the committee will not satisfy the Senator. It is not a large programme, but it is something in the right direction. The bill provides five good serviceable colliers at a very considerable expense, and I should hope that it would be a permanent feature of naval bills for the future, and that in considering the continued appropriations for the navy—and I expect so long as I am a member of this body to see appropriations for maintaining a strong, serviceable navy—we should go on each year and make as a part of that programme provision for colliers that may accompany the fleet in any emergency and which will always be a desirable and necessary part of the establishment.

The Senator is right in his general view of what we ought to do. But we have gone on devoting ourselves mainly, as the Senator and all Senators know, to the increase of the navy proper, the ships of the navy, and have not given great attention to these other very essential accessories to that part of the establishment. I do not believe that this year we are justified in doing more than what the bill provides in that respect.

So I would be glad if I could join with the Senator, and I am indebted to him for the early and valuable suggestions that he made, which certainly attracted my attention and which have led, I think, and the Senator is entitled to credit for that, to some development in this direction.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the Senator from Nevada be willing to have that speech of the Senator from Maine printed in the RECORD without reading?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I prefer to read it for the information of the Senator from Rhode Island. [Laughter.] I regard it as very instructive.

Now, I wish to quote a few words, and a few words only, from my own remarks, for the Senator from Maine has made the argument so much stronger than I could possibly make it that I am very glad to substitute his language for my own at all times.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am very glad to learn that this is but the commencement of a continuous policy.

That was the assurance of the Senator from Maine, representing this great committee.

The Senator from Maine will not think me too critical in saying that the action of the committee was hardly a realization of the hope which he indulged in his former speech in the Senate, for at that time his utterance was emphatic that there should not be another ship in the navy built until this needed want was filled. I agree with the Senator from Maine that there should be a limit to naval expenditures. I would gladly see all military expenditures reduced. I would not willingly favor any large increase in the present measure of expenditures. What I hoped for was that the commitee would refuse to report in favor of more fighting ships until the auxiliary navy was brought up to a certain standard.

Such a policy would not mean larger annual expenditures on the part of the Government, but it would mean a usable navy, a proportioned navy—a navy in which each part was adjusted in operation to every other part—not a great mechine of war, with essential parts absolutely lacking to such a degree that the machine would break down in case of war.

Mr. President, what conclusion have we reached at this session? The Senator from Maine, speaking, I suppose, for the committee as well as for himself, stated that the policy of adding this auxiliary navy would be a continuous policy. I looked, therefore, in this bill for an appropriation for auxiliary ships to at least an equal number with that in the appropriation of last year, and I found to my surprise that, whilst the total appropriation in this bill was raised about $12,000,000 above what it had been a year ago, there was an appropriation for only one dollar, as against five a year ago costing less than a million dollars.

Mr. President, I can only assume that the Senator from Maine has been overruled in his committee, that he has given the force of his great ability and influence to the building up of an auxiliary navy, and has doubtless been defeated in his own committee, overruled by a majority there, and I appeal to the Senate to stand by the Senator from Maine in the valiant fight that he is making for a well-proportioned, symmetrical navy, one that will not make simply a great parade of fighting ships to the world without the ability to sustain their operations in case of war.

Hence, I ask the Senate to strike out this appropriation for two battle ships, aggregating $9,000,000, and to substitute for that an appropriation of a similar amount for an auxiliary navy or the construction of such transports, colliers, dispatch boats, and scouts as the Executive of the Nation shall deem essential to a well-proportioned and symmetrical navy, for we must recollect that the War Board has called our attention not only to the need of colliers, but to the need of transports, dispatch boats, and scouts, and thus far the meager appropriations provided by the Naval Committee cover only the one item of colliers, probably the most essential item, it is true, for without coal in case of war our ships would, of course, be derelicts on the ocean.

Mr. President, the question may arise as to what use these ships can be put to during times of peace. My answer is that, so far as the limited number of auxiliary ships heretofore constructed is concerned, and adding to that number those called for by the amendment which I have proposed, there certainly will be absolute use for them in the navy itself, and continuous use, particularly if we indulge in such cruises as we have engaged in during the past year. I am inclined to think that that cruise has vastly improved the efficiency of the navy; and while such extensive cruises may not hereafter be indulged in, that programme will be partially, at least, carried out in the future. It seems that as in that cruise it was necessary to employ 27 foreign ships to aid the navy as auxiliary ships, certainly the 8 or 9 ships covered in this amendment will be needed.

But I do not urge that this auxiliary navy should be supplied simply for use in case of war. I contend that in building up our navy the Government should act in a businesslike way, and see to it that these auxiliary ships do not remain idle during times of peace, when there is no occasion for their use in connection with the navy. What use can they be put to? Well, in the first place, they can be used as training ships for the naval reserve. The Navy Department has called our attention again and again to the necessity of establishing a naval reserve of at least 10,000 men. I do not know whether the creation of that reserve has even as yet been commenced. It certainly has not reached much proportion. In case of war we can not recruit our fighting ships from our merchant marine, for the merchant marine is nonexistent. It is therefore necessary for us to train men for this purpose. We have, I believe, training schools at one or two places in this country. It strikes me that no better training school could be devised than a ship itself; that if you were to construct a building for a training school, the very best building you could construct is a ship; and a ship will cost no more than buildings upon the land.

The next question comes as to how you can use these ships when they are not needed by the navy for an actual cruise, and what useful purpose they can be put to; to what profitable use can they be put? Well, Mr. President, as these ships are to be manned in whole or in part by a naval reserve, consisting of young men who are being trained for the navy, if they are officered by naval officers they are certainly in a condition for foreign trade.

There is no reason why these great lines of development, for which a ship subsidy bill was sought to be passed at the last session, opening up about twelve or thirteen lines of travel not heretofore occupied by United States ships—lines of travel to South America, to Africa, to Australasia, and to Asia—could not be taken up by these ships. They could be leased, manned as they are, to some mercantile company, and be used in carrying our mail, and carrying our products to foreign ports. The moneys received from private companies for this kind of carriage would go a great way toward paying the interest upon the investment and reimbursing the large expenditures necessary in the establishment of this naval reserve.

These are the uses to which these ships can be put in case there may not be such an emergency as will require their use by the navy. I submit, therefore, that not only the necessities of war, but the necessities of peace, may be invoked for support of this amendment, and that it should pass as a substitute for the item providing for the fighting ships, which, under this appropriation, will cost $9,000,000 simply for the hulls and an additional $9,000,000, or nearly that, for the armor and equipment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have in a large degree recovered from the anxiety and almost panic which I felt a year ago with reference to the necessity for colliers and auxiliary ships. Since then the fleet has safely returned, will soon be moored in our own waters on the coast, and will be soon on its way to retirement, dismantled for overhauling and repairs in the navy-yards. The country and Congress, when they see the great extent of the bills that will have to be paid for this voyage in order to recuperate the navy, will be rid, I hope, of any danger in the future of any experiment like such a trip around the world and will realize that we shall pass into a condition of security and tranquillity and that there will be no need of the proposed colliers in time of peace. They are very expensive.

It is one of the consolations that come to us with the march of time that we learn to become accustomed and reconciled to present conditions. I look for a condition much better, with regard to the navy in the future, and to an opportunity of restricting naval appropriations. As I have said, I have recovered from my feeling of the necessity and the pinch for building these colliers. In order to expedite public business, as there seems to be no disposition to further debate this matter——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has just remarked that there will be no need of these colliers in times of peace. I will ask him whether there is any need of fighting ships in times of peace?

Mr. HALE. No; not much.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But there is need of fighting ships in time of war, and I presume they are built for that emergency. As I understand the Senator, according to his statements of last year, in case of war the fighting ships would, without adequate colliers, be—

As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose, Mr. President, they will ever be fighting ships. In order to expedite business, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to reserve two amendments—the amendment relating to the Marine Corps and the amendment relating to the battle ships.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does any other Senator desire to reserve amendments?

Mr. BACON. I have an amendment to offer, but not to reserve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments, excepting the two mentioned, which have been reserved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], be concurred in? Without objection, they will be considered as concurred in. The question is on the first amendment reserved by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he expects to finish the bill to-night?

Mr. HALE. If we can get a speedy vote on the two propositions that have been reserved, we can easily dispose of the bill. I do not know whether any Senator desires to debate any of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care, Mr. President, to debate further the question of the Marine Corps. I only reserved the amendment in order to have a vote upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to debate for a few moments the amendment relating to the Marine Corps.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, on which I desire to submit some observations.

Mr. HALE. Has the amendment of the Senator been offered?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It has not. I expect to offer it in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator has it prepared——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have it prepared.

Mr. HALE. And is willing to offer it now and let it be printed——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad to do so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

Mr. HALE. If it goes over, we will all see it in print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to be called the Commission on Naval Bases, to be composed of officers of the Engineer Corps of the Army and officers of the Navy. It shall be the duty of this commission to inquire into and report to Congress during its next regular session the number, location, and capacity for rapid repairs of the naval bases which are required by strategic considerations for the successful conduct of the fleet in time of war and for maintaining the fleet continuously in a state of readiness for war in time of peace, the report to include recommendations as to what existing navy-yards and naval stations can be expanded to the capacity required for an efficient military base for a large fleet, and the location and capacity of such new bases as should be constructed, and a further recommendation as to what existing navy-yards and naval stations should be wholly or partially abandoned. For these purposes the commission is authorized to sit during the session or recess of Congress, at such times as it may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summons and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical experts, stenographers, and messengers necessary, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission is created. The commission may, through subcommittees or otherwise, conduct their work or any part of it. A sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this section and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission and its members is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman of said commission by any clerk appointed for that purpose by the commission; and hereafter no part of the public moneys or of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made by Congress shall be used for the payment of compensation or expenses of any commission, or any members thereof, unless the creation of such commission shall have been authorized by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, Senators have indicated a desire to debate these propositions, and it is so late that I do not feel constrained, although I hoped to dispose of the bill to-day, to ask the Senate further to continue in session to-night. But I want to utilize to-morrow to the very best extent, because another appropriation bill is ready, and there are other matters pending, so that I will move that when the Senate adjourns to-night it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourns to-night it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, I will also give notice that, in order to gain time to-morrow morning, I shall ask that the bill be taken up directly after the Journal has been read, so that we may have the entire day. I do not suppose it will take that long, but we shall try to get the bill out of the way by 12 or 1 o'clock. I give that notice, and I will now——

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator moves that the Senate adjourn——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I merely want to make an inquiry. The Secretary in reading stated that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would come in as section 3. I understood that section 2 went out on a point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Another section was substituted for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Another section was substituted for section 2.

Mr. LODGE. I understand now. It is all right.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that I may have permission to have inserted in the RECORD reports, statements, and figures compiled by the department. I will furnish them later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter was subsequently submitted as follows:

UNITED STATES NAVY.

Letter from Mr. Truman H. Newberry, Secretary of the Navy, to Mr. William S. Woods, editor Literary Digest.

JANUARY 28, 1909.

SIR: In reply to your letter of January 25, in which you say that you are desirous of taking up for treatment an article in the current number of McClure's Magazine by Mr. G. K. Turner, it should be made entirely clear, in any impartial discussion of this article, that Mr. Turner has premised his statement concerning the saving in expenditure which might be made in the Navy Department on an imaginary and impossible set of conditions. It is this which constitutes the essential fallacy of his deductions and makes his figures more startling than accurate. It is as though he asserted that the United States Steel Corporation might effect a great saving (as doubtless it could) if its present plant could be immediately discarded without loss and instantly rebuilt in accord with the latest developments of the art.

Mr. Turner has imagined a navy consisting of what he considers the proper number of ships, built and equipped overnight, so that the very latest ideas are expressed in their construction, together with a supporting establishment consisting of what he considers the necessary number of repair plants to take care of this ideal fleet. It is impossible to discuss statements put upon this basis or to make any detailed comment on them. It may be well, however, to point out the possibilities of inaccuracy in his figures in several instances. He states that the navy cost $122,000,000 for the past year. In reality it cost about $117,000,000—an error on his part of $5,000,000. He calculates that for 20 Dreadnoughts it would cost $15,000,000 yearly for maintenance and repairs. By all figures known to the department they would cost at least $20,000,000—another error of $5,000,000.

Mr. Turner states that all but three stations on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast could be dispensed with, and that the yard force could be cut to less than 10 per cent of the present strength, or about 3,000 men. He forgets, apparently, that Cavite, in the Philippines, as well as a west-coast repair plant, must be maintained on the Pacific, and that the Washington Gun Factory, employing about 4,000 men, and which must be kept up, would more than absorb the number of men he allows for the whole establishment. In his reference to certain small southern yards, he speaks of the large cost for the marine force stationed at such places to guard government propery, overlooking entirely the fact that the marine force is maintained for its service in the event of war, and that it is employed at these yards, not merely in the capacity of watchmen, but as affording a means of keeping the officers and men in a proper state of training and discipline. He might as well speak of the entire appropriation for the army as a waste, in view of the fact that the whole purpose of the army in time of peace is to maintain a nucleus of a proper military force to be used in the event of war.

As a matter of fact, the Navy Department has a real and not an imaginary set of conditions to work with. It has a certain number of vessels which have been determined on from time to time as then seemed wisest to the department and to Congress. It also has a certain number of stations similarly bequeathed to it, chosen with an eye to their military and strategic value as well as to their economical possibilities as industrial plants. Both ships and stations at the time of their authorization were the subject of careful investigation by the department and full discussion by Congress. To this method of determining on a proper establishment, arrived at through years of discussion and development, Mr. Turner opposes his individual view, based on such brief study of naval conditions as afforded by his occupation as a special investigator for his magazine.

The question for the country, therefore, and for its representative, the head of the department, is not what might be done if a magician's wand could summon a complete organization, but what may best be done with that which has developed coincidently with the art of making war. It must not be forgotten that naval warfare and the implements for waging it have absolutely changed during the period of less than two decades. It is common knowledge that ships have developed in size beyond the wildest forecasts of even a few years ago. The Indiana, 348 feet long and 10,000 tons displacement, was a big ship in 1890, when she was authorized. Battle ships now being talked of are 535 feet long and of 26,000 tons displacement. Docks that were thought ample for the needs of all time and harbors with a corresponding depth of approach have become inadequate. There are still docks and approaches able to take our heaviest vessels when needed, though Mr. Turner does not emphasize this fact, and larger docks are building. If our naturally shallow harbors must be dredged for men-of-war of the future, the work will be demanded by our merchantmen sooner than by the battle ships, for the former are outstripping even their protectors in increased size and draft.

With the size of ships has increased their complexity. Therefore repair shops have become cramped and have had to be extended.

As with ships and with our plants, methods suitable to past years have proved unsuitable for modern conditions. In former times the work of the various departments at the navy-yard was differentiated to a greater extent than at present. For that reason and because the yard was primarily a military and not a manufacturing plant, and partly as a concession to conflicting opinions and interests, separate establishments grew up at each yard. Many of these manufacturing plants, like the gun factory at Washington and the powder factory, was instituted as necessary to escape the exactions of trusts in the specialized classes of material called for by the navy, as well as to secure the performance of such work under the immediate supervision of trained ordnance experts. Modern conditions and improved shop methods have made consolidation of work imperative, both from the view point of military efficiency and of economy. There has been for many years past a gradual consolidation of work to meet changing conditions. A very radical consolidation at the navy-yards was determined on some months ago and has already been effected. It merges all the manufacturing functions of the yard into one organization along similar lines to that common among commercial industrial plants. The consolidation of various bureaus in the department will follow as a natural corrollary to these changes.

The same money-absorbing cycle of change has been going on in foreign countries. Millions could undoubtedly have been saved by each in the past if the developments in battle-ship building of the last few years could have been foretold; but each has constantly had to keep pace with the times and pay the penalty exacted by the new inventions and more daring achievements which have rendered obsolescent the work of the year before.

The United States has always been abreast of the best current practice in naval development with the material provided it, as its record afloat in peace and war abundantly testifies, as well as a comparison of the efficiency of its fleet at the present time with those of other powers. Ship for ship, it stands second to none. If this result has been achieved by the naval establishment as a whole (for the fighting ship is the final expression of its concerted effort), is it not logical to assume, as I have proved to my own critical satisfaction, that, aside from the relatively small defects in administration which crop up and have to be eradicated with changing times in all great concerns alike, the navy is provided for by Congress and administered by its subordinate officials with conscientious regard for the public interest.

I inclose herewith, for your information, a statement taken from the annual report of the Paymaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, giving an analysis of the cost of the naval establishment during that period.

Respectfully,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Secretary.

Mr. WILLIAM S. WOODS,
Editor Literary Digest,

BRIEF ANALYSIS OF TOTAL APPROPRIATIONS MADE FOR THE NAVAL SERVICE DURING THE TEN-YEAR PERIOD 1899–1908.

There has been appropriated for the naval service, for all purposes, during the past ten years, $921,562,373. Of this amount there has been turned back into the Treasury, from unexpended balances of current appropriations, $13,014,015.

In order to indicate the purposes for which the above appropriations were made, this total may be classified as follows:

	Amount.	Percentage of total appropriation.
1. For increase of the navy, including construction and machinery and armor and armament	$285,558,186.67	31.0
2. For pay and allowances of officers, and pay, allowances, clothing, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps	272,343,075.27	29.6
3. For indirect charges relating to personnel, such as hospitals and other expenditures under the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, training stations and barracks for officers of the Navy and Marine Corps; all expenditures at the Naval Academy and in connection with the Naval Militia; miscellaneous expenditures under the Bureau of Navigation and the Marine Corps in connection with personnel; incidental charges under the Bureau of Navigation connected with personnel and maintenance of colliers and the payment of their merchant crews	48,721,773.87	5.3
4. Coal and coaling stations	34,888,494.45	3.8
5. Maintenance and repair of matériel of the fleet, including all ammunition, stores, oil, and other consumable supplies, except coal (This item includes maintenance charges under ordnance, equipment, construction and repair, steam engineering, and supplies and accounts which are directly chargeable to cost of operation of industrial plants, but which are not readily separated therefrom).	201,588,805.92	21.9
6. Cost of improvements at dockyards, including lands, buildings, dry docks, wharves, dredging, major part of machinery plants; repairs, preservation and maintenance of all public works, including operation of central power plants; cost of buildings, machinery, etc., at all ordnance establishments, including proving ground, powder factory, gun factory, magazines, etc	73,489,271.27	7.9
7. Appropriations not classified, including Naval Observatory, relief appropriations, damage claims, bounties, prize money, etc	4,972,765.74	.5
Total	921,562,373.19

From the above it will appear that the appropriations on account of the increase of the navy, including "Increase of the navy—Construction and machinery" and "Increase of the navy—Armor and armament," amounted to 31 per cent of the total appropriations. That the expenditures by the Navy Department for new construction have been well and economically made is obvious by reference to the tabular statements of cost of battle ships and armored cruisers built for our own and the British navy. The tables which are attached to memoranda herewith submitted show conclusively that the present cost of our battle ships and armored cruisers, per ton of displacement, is considerably less than that of British battle ships and armored cruisers of similar type and date of contract.

It is also apparent that the appropriations for personnel (items 2 and 3) amount to 34.9 per cent of the total appropriation. The expenditures under these appropriations are practically beyond the economic control of the Navy Department, since they are payments on account of services specifically authorized by Congress, at definite or specified rates of pay, and do not admit of more than nominal control by the Navy Department, except in so far as the personnel may be below its maximum number or where various services directly connected with the personnel may be temporarily on a basis involving reduced cost of maintenance.

It is also obvious that appropriations for coal and coaling stations, amounting to 3.8 per cent of the naval appropriations, can not well be reduced without limiting the efficiency of the fleet.

It also appears from item 5 that the amounts appropriated for the maintenance of the matériel of the fleet, ashore and afloat, including all ammunition, stores, supplies, and so forth, representing 21.9 per cent of the total appropriation. It may be stated in this connection that practically half of the expenditures under these appropriations which are devoted to the maintenance of the matériel of the fleet are made on account of the purchase of ammunition, stores, supplies of all kinds, material, shop machinery, and work done under contract or subject to direct purchase, leaving only about 50 per cent of the appropriations of this character, or less than 11 per cent of the total appropriations for the navy, to be expended on account of direct labor charges. Inasmuch as it is largely in a reduction of the labor charges that economies can be expected by good administration, it should be obvious that, with an average expenditure for labor of $10,000,000 during the past ten years, it would be exceedingly difficult to effect the reduction of "many millions" so noted by sensational writers as having been wastefully spent.

It also appears from item 6 that the development of dockyards and other naval stations, including ordnance establishment and including lands, buildings, improvements, dry docks, wharves, dredging, machinery plants, and the care and preservation of public works, accounts for 7.9 per cent of the total appropriation for the ten-year period under consideration.

The above-noted percentages, taken in connection with other memoranda herewith submitted, show most conclusively that there can not possibly be such great waste in connection with the administration of dockyards, maintenance of the fleet, etc., as has been recently alleged by sensational writers. On the contrary, considering the results obtained and the necessity of maintaining a large number of stations for military and strategic reasons in time of war, also taking into consideration the comparative expenditures of the United States Navy and the British navy for the maintenance of the fleet and for other purposes connected with the naval establishment, it is obvious that the administration of the United States Navy Department has been very creditable indeed. The recent changes in the method of carrying on work at navy-yards, some of which changes were inaugurated nearly a year ago, will greatly increase the efficiency and economy of navy-yard work, as will undoubtedly appear from reports which will be submitted during the next fiscal year.

COMPARISON OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR NAVAL PUBLIC WORKS IN GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES DURING THE FISCAL YEARS 1896–1909, INCLUSIVE.

The accompanying tabular statement gives a comparison of appropriations for naval public works in Great Britain and the United States during the fiscal years 1896 to 1909, inclusive.

In 1895 the British naval authorities began to take serious measures to put the British dockyards in such condition as to permit them to fully meet the requirements of the fleet. In order to provide for the large expenditures which would be involved, a "naval works act" was passed by Parliament in that year (1895), and supplementary acts in subsequent years, these naval works acts authorizing certain large expenditures which were to be spread over a term of years. These expenditures under the naval works acts were covered by a special loan, repayable in installments from funds appropriated in the naval votes; but the final payments have not yet been made, and will not be made for several years to come, so that the British navy estimates only include a portion of the total amounts actually expended on dockyard extensions under the naval works acts.

In addition to expenditures under the naval works acts there were other dockyard improvements provided for in the naval estimates themselves.

The accompanying table shows, as far as possible from comparison of British and American official documents, the amounts appropriated in each country for naval public works. Excluding from consideration hospitals, naval homes, barracks, training stations, coaling stations, and ordnance establishments, the tabular statement indicates clearly that the appropriations for dockyards, supply stations, harbors of refuge, and naval bases, including buildings, dry docks, improvements, extensions, and so forth, were two and one-half times greater in Great Britain than in the United States—the figures for Great Britain being $128,987,560 and for the United States $51,015,864—for the fourteen years under consideration.

COMPARATIVE NUMBER OF WORKMEN EMPLOYED IN BRITISH DOCKYARDS AND UNITED STATES NAVY-YARDS AT HOME.

The average number of workmen employed in the dockyards in Great Britain during the fiscal year 1908 was 27,315.

The corresponding number employed in the general building and repair navy-yards and stations in the United States during the same period was 14,000.

The stations included for the United States are Portsmouth, N. H.; Boston, Mass.; New York, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Norfolk, Va.; Mare Island, Cal.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Charleston, S. C.; Key West, Fla.; Pensacola, Fla.; and New Orleans, La.

The navy-yard, Washington, D. C., is omitted, as it is purely an ordnance establishment, corresponding to the British establishment at Woolwich. The number of employees at Woolwich is not known and is not included in the total given above for the British dockyards.

Under the provisions of an executive order issued May 6, 1896, all employees of this character paid from lump appropriations, as well as those paid from "Civil establishment," were placed in the classified civil service, subject to appointment after competitive examination.

In the Navy Department proper at Washington there are 566 classified employees provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial act.

Total number of employees in both classes, 2,780.

Mr. HALE. Now, I wish further to say, as a personal matter, that I think yesterday I did an injustice to the powder-manufacturing concerns in stating what I heard and believed to be true that they had heretofore in emergencies put up the price of their product and had made the Government pay undue prices. I have reason to believe that the statement which I made was incorrect. I regret that I made it, and I make this statement now in order to show that I do not now believe the statement which I made was justified by the facts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

NAVY-YARDS AND NAVAL STATIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I was given permission to print hydrographic data relating to United States navy-yards and naval stations. There were some mistakes in it, and I now ask unanimous consent to have a reprint, with corrections, of the document, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the document room.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PAROLE OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to ask for a reprint of the bill (S. 4027) to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes. This bill was partially considered by the Senate and certain amendments were agreed to. Pending that it passed from the consideration of the Senate. I now ask that the bill may be reprinted as it has been amended in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator want the amendments to be printed in the same lettering as the body of the bill?

Mr. BACON. I presume so. Certain sections have been stricken out and others have been amended. I wish the bill to be reprinted, so that we may see it as it is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 17, 1909, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1909.

[Continuation of legislative day of Monday, February 15, 1909.]

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 11 o'clock a. m.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR WESTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill H. R. 26068, and consider the same at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 26068) providing for an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional judge for the western district of Pennsylvania, whose length of term, compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judges of said district.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I reserve the right to object, and would like to interrogate the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. I will explain the bill. This bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. I was told by three or four members of the committee, gentlemen of long service, that the case made out for this bill was the best case that had been made in years before the committee. The western district of Pennsylvania includes something over 20 counties in Pennsylvania, reaching to both sides of the Allegheny Mountains. As the gentleman from Missouri knows, it is full of industries of varied and very important character—manufactories of iron and steel, glass, coal, petroleum, lumber, and all the industries that pertain both to rail and river transportation. We only have one district judge in that district, and the figures presented to the committee show that during the last nine years the increase in civil cases in the district has amounted to 906 per cent, the increase in equity cases amounted to 29 per cent, and the increase in the cases on the trial list amounted to 350 per cent; in other words, there was an average increase in all branches of the business of the circuit court from the year 1899 to 1908 of 428 per cent. The circuit court was in session and transacted business during three hundred and four days of last year. Our circuit judge, who constitutes one-third of the court of appeals, Judge Buffington, was delayed in Philadelphia by the business of that court over four months of the year. We had four judges from outside districts to aid the local judges: Judge Dayton, of West Virginia; Judge Archbald, of the middle district; Judge Lanning, from New Jersey; and Judge Bradford, who came in and held court. The district court was open every day in the year, except Sundays and holidays, and transacted business.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many district judges are there in Pennsylvania?

Mr. DALZELL. There are four district judges—two judges in Philadelphia, a district judge of the middle district, and one district judge in western Pennsylvania. I want to call attention to this fact: In Philadelphia, where they have two district judges and a circuit judge, their record of cases last year was 806 cases, as against 1,044 cases in the western district. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that a refusal to create an additional judge in this district means, in my judgment, a substantial denial of justice, and I trust there will be no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not detail one of the Philadelphia judges to go down there and hold court?

Mr. DALZELL. We have detailed at times four different judges from outside. The Philadelphia people have enough to do to take care of themselves. We have had Judge Dayton, of West Virginia, Judge Archbald, of the middle district, Judge Bradford and Judge Lanning, from New Jersey.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. While we are at this thing, I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion about this proposition: What is the reason we could not remodel the whole judicial system and abolish the district judges, and have them all circuit judges?

Mr. DALZELL. I think you are dead right about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are eternally acting as circuit judges.

Mr. DALZELL. I think you are right about it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not like the number now to be increased, but I will not object.

Mr. MACON. Reserving the right to object, I desire to say that I do not think there is any greater demand in the western district of Pennsylvania for a judge than there is a demand for additional revenue in the Treasury at this time; and being in part a representative of the whole people, and interested in the revenues of the people, I must exercise for the people the power I have as their representative to protect them against an increase of expenditures, and inasmuch as the passage of this bill will take at least $6,000 out of the revenues of the country, out of the Treasury annually, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas objects.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, to suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, suspend the rules, and pass the bill. Is a second demanded? If not, the second will be considered as ordered.

A second was not demanded.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR WESTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill H. R. 27061, suspend the rules, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, suspend the rules, and pass the following bill with committee amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27061) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the western district of Washington.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a resident of the western division of the western district of Washington as an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Washington, who shall reside in said division, whose length of term, compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judge of said district.

SEC. 2. That the present district judge in said district and the one appointed under this act shall agree between themselves upon the division of business and assignment of cases for trial in said district: Provided, however, That in case the said two district judges do not agree the senior circuit judge of the ninth circuit shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 4, 5, and 6, the following: "a resident of the western division of the western district of Washington as."

Strike out, in lines 7 and 8, the following: "who shall reside in said division."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I demand a second.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, this measure is the same bill I had up for consideration a few days ago in this House. I hope for favorable action on this bill by the House to-day. This bill does not provide for the creation of a new or additional judicial district in the State of Washington, but it does provide for one additional judge to serve in the existing western Washington district—making two judges in that district instead of one, as now.

This bill has been heartily recommended by the Attorney-General of the United States, as disclosed by his letter in the printed report upon this bill, and the bill has been unanimously recommended by the House Judiciary Committee. There is no judicial district in the United States that needs relief more than this district does.

With the permission of the House, I should like to call attention to and incorporate into my remarks upon this subject a statement showing in detail the necessity for the passage of this bill. This statement was prepared by my brother, Edward E. Cushman, of Tacoma, Wash., a leading member of the bar of the judicial district of western Washington:

REASONS WHY THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON SHOULD EITHER BE DIVIDED INTO TWO DISTRICTS OR AN ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE CREATED THEREFOR.

The western district of Washington extends entirely across the State from north to south on the Pacific side, and is bounded on the south by the Columbia River, a great navigable highway throughout such boundary, and across which, in the State of Oregon, is the city of Portland, the metropolis of that State and the center of trade extending throughout the southern part of said district. The district is bounded on the west by the Pacific Ocean, with a shore line of more than a thousand miles with its indentations, and a great number of harbors put to important commercial uses, including those of Willapa, Grays Harbor, Port Angeles, Port Townsend, Bellingham, Everett, Seattle, Tacoma, and Olympia. A great part of the northern boundary of the district is also an ocean boundary, with harbors and ports. Immediately across the northern boundary are the largest cities of western Canada—Victoria and Vancouver. In the eastern part of the district are government reserves, large timber interests, and mines, the two latter largely controlled by foreign corporations.

It will be at once seen that all of these conditions especially tend to create business in the federal courts, both by reason of the exclusive jurisdiction of those courts over the subject-matter in admiralty cases, customs cases, and immigrant cases, and on account of the diverse citizenship of the litigants.

This district is divided into two divisions, legally the northern and western divisions, sometimes called the northern and southern divisions. The present court is held at Seattle in the northern division, and at Tacoma in the western division, there being nine counties in each of these divisions, and the railroads and other means of transportation centering at these two cities.

Another thing that adds to the burden of this litigation is the fact that almost all of the large industrial corporations engaged in business in Alaska either are located with their principal offices in these cities or have branch establishments there.

Another reason that such litigation has increased immensely recently is on account of the railroad construction and development in the limits of the district and State within the last three years, during that time being greater than any other State in the Union, and with the lines constructed during that time and those now in process of construction almost doubling its railroad mileage. While this of itself has greatly increased the business, it is only a small part of what that increase will be when these roads are operated, as they are integral parts of the Pacific railroads, sometimes called "transcontinental lines," including the Canadian Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Great Northern, the Union Pacific, and other lines.

As showing the needs of this district as based on population alone, as compared with the eastern district of Washington, without any harbors or water frontier, or the litigation growing out of the same, probably the latest figures obtainable would be at the last national election. The First and Second Congressional districts in Washington lie within the western district, excepting one small, sparsely settled county. The Third Congressional District lies entirely within the eastern district. For Congressmen in the First and Second Congressional districts there were cast 104,336 votes at the last election, while in the third district there were cast but 62,488, showing a preponderance of population in the western district of almost two to one.

It is possible in other circuits often to relieve an overworked district judge by sending in a judge from another district to assist in the disposal of cases. This is practicable, because of the smaller sizes of the districts, consequently the lesser distances, and the fact of the other circuits having extra district judges in certain of their districts, as well as a number of resident circuit judges. The ninth circuit is differently situated. Its court of appeals has a great and varied jurisdiction, not only including the ordinary appellate jurisdiction over the districts of California, Nevada, Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and Montana in the strictly federal appellate jurisdictional sense, but also over the three courts of Alaska and that of the Hawaiian Islands, and also a general appellate jurisdiction in all controversies in Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, and the ministerial courts of Asia. The inevitable result of this, not only occasioned by the great bulk of cases, but by their intricate diversity, is that the circuit judges of the ninth circuit can not and do not try or consider any cases in either the circuit or district courts in that circuit. They are constantly at work with the appealed cases brought before them in the court of appeals. In the entire circuit there is no district other than the northern district of California which has more than a single district judge. This fact and the great size and distance apart of the various districts render it so impracticable as to substantially prevent the judges of other districts rendering relief. They are not only retarded by the loss of time, effort, and embarrassment, but with no judge left during their absence in their own districts they are constantly haunted with the dread of the interests in their home district being neglected and prejudiced in some of those many emergency matters that are constantly arising.

A visiting judge is not fair, either to the attorneys of the district or the litigants, for in many cases there must be motions for new trials, some of which are bound to be granted, although part of the law of the case may have been settled by the first trial. This renders necessary the return of the identical visiting judge who tried such cases, and experience shows that it may be years before this can be accomplished.

There is an especial hardship being worked on the attorneys of litigants in the southern division of this district. The present judge is a resident of Seattle, and has been doing all in his power to dispose of the work in that division, which has been occupying almost his entire time, and leaving the work in the southern division largely to visiting judges, there being long intervals between their visits. During the year just past half of the court in the southern division was held by visiting judges. There have been in that division begun in the last half of the year just past 117 cases, but only terminated during the entire year 55; that is, during the entire year less than half of the number of cases begun in six months were tried—that is, less than 1 in 4 for the year—and of these the resident judge tried only about half—that is, 1 in 8.

Although it has been said that comparisons are odious, tables are herewith appended showing the volume of business done in such district and that in other districts, the bar committee intrusted with this matter feeling justified in so doing, as the same show, not the absence of necessity in other districts, but the greatness of the need in the western district. In these tables, which are compiled from the report of the Attorney-General of the United States covering all the districts of the United States for the years 1908 and 1907, the statistics regarding criminal cases and bankruptcy cases are omitted. There is a natural reluctance on the part of this committee to contest with other districts for supremacy either in criminal or bankruptcy records; but that is not the only reason they are omitted. It is felt that the volume of general civil business is a safer and surer guide to determine the amount of the work done and the needs. As is well known, the greater part of the work in bankruptcy cases is done by referees in bankruptcy, and furnishes no safe criterion as to the actual work done by a judge. In the criminal cases the different parts of the United States appear to have their favorite forms of crime, which throw the tables all out of balance in this particular. For instance, the internal-revenue cases in many of the Southern States are little more than police cases, many of which may be disposed of in a day. For example, as shown by the Attorney-General's report for 1908, page 117, in the western district of Virginia there were terminated 225 criminal cases of this class during the year, but of these it appears that 109 were terminated by pleas of guilty, 43 nolle prossed or discontinued, and only 29 tried. It has therefore been thought the surer guide would be a table showing the number of civil cases in which the United States was a party, the total amounts of the judgments therein, the number of all other cases, excluding criminal and bankruptcy cases, and the amounts of the judgments rendered therein.

In the following table where in any district the amounts are equal to or exceed those in the western district of Washington, the same are underscored.

In the following table the item in the Attorney-General's report headed "Pending cases" has been discarded as in no way tending to show the amount of work the court is doing or the rate at which the work is accumulating.

[a] No data.

It would appear that if the number of cases in the above classes commenced and terminated were added together it would give a composite number, tending both to show the amount of work being done and that accumulating. If this is done in the first class of cases—that is, in which the United States is a party—a comparison of the western district of Washington with the other districts will show that the number is only equaled or exceeded by that in the northern district of California, the southern district of New York, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the northern district of Illinois, the eastern district of New York, the northern district of Georgia, and the western district of North Carolina. In each of the first five districts named there are already two or more district judges. In the remaining an examination of the Attorney-General's report will show an abnormal condition, throwing those districts out of balance in this particular, as for example, in the northern district of California, out of a total number of 131 cases of the above class, as against 111 in the western district of Washington, it will be found that the chief items of that total were cases under the 28-hour law, 33 begun and 21 terminated, while in the western district of Washington the chief item making up the total consists of miscellaneous cases. It would appear from the report that the United States in the northern district of California and the northern district of Illinois were bringing a number of test cases under this statute. It will also be observed that in the great majority of districts there was not a single case of this character. In the eastern, southern, and northern districts of New York there was not a single case. Again, in the eastern district of New York, with a total of 148 cases of this class commenced and terminated, as against 111 in the western district of Washington an examination of the report will show that 94 of the cases in that district were to cancel naturalization certificates, and a very few general cases. There was not an equal number of cases to cancel naturalization certificates, excepting in one district—the northern district of Illinois—in all the other districts of the United States put together, and in the southern district of New York there was not a single case of this character. So that it will be seen on this point that the excess in number is occasioned in these districts by temporarily abnormal conditions. In the northern district of Illinois, with a total of 712 civil cases in which the United States was a party, 580 of these were of the two foregoing kinds—that is, under the 28-hour law and for the cancellation of naturalization certificates. Something of the same kind is true in the two remaining districts, in which the total number of cases equals or exceeds that in the western district of Washington—that is, in the northern district of Georgia and the western district of North Carolina—for in the former of these two districts in these cases there were only judgments recovered amounting to $1,972.60, and in the latter district to the amount of $7,857.48, as against $77,556.75 recovered in the same cases in the western district of Washington. It is submitted that under this classification the needs of the western district of Washington are shown to be more pressing than of any other district with one district judge, and greater than some with two.

Passing now to the second column in the above table—that is, the amounts of the judgments recovered—as has been stated, the total amount of judgments in the western district of Washington aggregates for that year $77,556.75. This is greater than the totals of either the southern district of New York, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, or the northern district of Illinois, and is only exceeded in two districts, the northern district of California (where there are two district judges and one resident circuit judge) and the district of Maryland. An examination of the table will show that in these two districts there were exceptional conditions to destroy the value of the figures therefrom, for in Maryland, with only three customs cases in the entire year, there were judgments therein rendered of $150,000, and in the northern district of California in six cases under the land laws there were judgments rendered to the amount of $73,025.05. In miscellaneous cases of this class the judgments recovered in the western district of Washington were more than twice as much as those in both the latter States. It is submitted that the figures under this heading show the needs of the western district to be greater than those of any other district.

Passing to the third column or heading in the above table, covering the number of cases in which the United States is not a party, excepting bankruptcy, commenced and terminated during such year, the Attorney-General's report and the above table show the total number for the western district of Washington to be 521. The only districts in which this number is exceeded are in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the southern district of New York, the district of New Jersey, the northern district of Illinois, the northern district of California, the district of Massachusetts, the western district of Pennsylvania, the eastern district of Illinois, the northern district of Ohio, the eastern district of New York, and the western district of Missouri. The first five mentioned of the above districts have two or more district judges. Two of the remaining have not only a district judge, but a resident circuit judge, leaving only four other districts, all of which are exceeded by the western district of Washington under the other heads of such table.

Passing to the fourth column or heading of the table, covering the total amount of judgments recovered during the year in this general class of cases where the United States was not a party, excluding bankruptcy cases, it will be seen that in the western district of Washington such judgments amounted to $694,752.96. This amount was only exceeded in the following districts: The northern district of California, the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the southern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, the district of Indiana, the northern district of Ohio, and the eastern district of Louisiana. The first three named, as above stated, have two or more district judges. The two following each have a resident circuit judge in addition to a district judge, and the others are exceeded by the western district of Washington under the first two headings in the table.

It will be seen by the Attorney-General's report and the foregoing extracts therefrom that there is but one district in the entire United States which exceeds the western district of Washington on all of the foregoing heads and that is the northern district of California, where exceptional conditions have already been pointed out as concerning the first two heads. The same is true concerning that district as to the last two. The earthquake and fire in San Francisco, situated in the northern district of California, caused many suits to be recently brought against foreign insurance companies. This, under the last two heads in the above table, throws the report out of balance, as these conditions are transitory and not permanent.

At pages 185 and 186 of the Attorney-General's report will be found a summary of all the business of all the districts of the United States. In this table, under the above headings, it will be seen that the average number of cases terminated in each district during the year was 107.4, while there were terminated in the western district of Washington 249, more than twice as many as in the average of all the districts. And yet this showing is not fair to the western district of Washington, for the reason that many of the districts had more than one district judge, and many of them had resident circuit judges. The same table will show that the average number of cases begun in each district in such time was 161.21, while there was for the same time begun in the western district of Washington 272. As above pointed out, this is a showing unfair to the western district of Washington, for although there are 85 districts, including the three divisions of Alaska, yet there are about 100 judges, which would show a still greater discrepancy.

There is one other reason that renders our needs in the foregoing particulars greater than in most other districts. With all the mass of business that is to be dispatched, the present judge is compelled to hold his court on wheels, having terms in both Tacoma and Seattle, which occupies much time going and coming, and necessarily separates the court from its records to a certain extent, greatly embarrassing the dispatch of work.

It is submitted that it is clearly shown by the foregoing that the needs of the district are imperative and urgent, and that the amount of business pending, let alone the great increase to be anticipated in the immediate future, is amply sufficient to warrant the division of the district and the creation of separate courts, and that to give the district an additional judge at this time is simply a makeshift, affording only temporary relief, to be ultimately followed by the creation of a new district.

Mr. Speaker, This House has just passed a bill providing for an additional district judge for the western district of Pennsylvania. I was impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who preceded me, detailing to some extent the conditions that exist in that judicial district. I have no doubt but that relief is needed in the shape of an additional judge for that district in Pennsylvania. I know we need relief in our western district of Washington. The House having just passed a bill providing for an additional judge in the western district of Pennsylvania, I certainly trust the House will grant us similar relief in the State of Washington by passing this bill.

I am not here to impugn the figures of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], but his figures, as I understood them, showed the increase of business in his judicial district between the year 1889 and the present year of 1908——

Mr. DALZELL. No; the year 1899, not the year 1889.

Mr. CUSHMAN. I stand corrected, then; I did not understand the date correctly when the gentleman was speaking. I have prepared a brief table making a comparison between the amount of litigation for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1908, in the western district of Pennsylvania, and the amount of litigation in the western district of the State of Washington, as follows:

Name of district.	United States civil cases.		Amount of judgments United States civil cases.	Suits, United States not party.		Judgments in cases United States not party.
	Commenced.	Terminated.		Commenced.	Terminated.
Western district Pennsylvania	27	31	$2,045.38	325	218	$732,518.02
Western district Washington	60	51	77,556.75	272	249	694,752.96

I submit that these figures show at least equal need for relief in the western district of Washington as in the western district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the merits of this bill, nor the one relating to the Pennsylvania judge, but I do feel that it is not improper to call attention to the fact that we sit here with one-third of a quorum and pass bills by unanimous consent, to create new judges for district courts of the United States, at a salary of $6,000 each during service, and then retired on a salary of $6,000 for life, putting a charge upon the Treasury of the United States in creating these new offices without the slightest protest from Republican or Democrat.

I am not on the committee that examines the bills and can not and will not speak with reference to their merits, but I see here every day when we have up private claims that nothing except bills by unanimous consent can be considered. Claims that have been due for many years, decided favorably by the Court of Claims, unpaid for years, get absolutely no consideration, or if passed must be passed over every technical objection that can be made. I do not question the motives of the gentlemen who make the objections, because they have a right to make them. But I want to call attention to the fact that we are loading down the Treasury of the United States with salaries for district judges of $6,000 for life. We have a bill now pending proposing to increase those salaries 50 per cent; still we sit here and pass bills creating new judges without any objection whatever. I do not question the merits of the bills, because I do not know anything about them, but I am satisfied that 90 per cent of the House knows no more about them than I do. It only shows the tendency and the direction in which we are going.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MACON. I desire to state that I objected to unanimous consent a few moments ago to the consideration of the bill offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I was not given an opportunity to object to this bill by unanimous consent, for it was presented under a motion to suspend the rules. I am not one-third of the House, and for that reason I can not prevent the passage of bills when two-thirds only are necessary to pass them.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman did not demand a second, and nobody else would demand it after the gentleman from Arkansas had objected to unanimous consideration, supposing he would make the demand. I know the gentleman could not have prevented the passage of the bill, but I am calling attention to the fact that when a heavy load is to be laid upon the Treasury nobody objects. If a clerk's salary is to be raised a few dollars, or a small claim put through the House, then objection is made. I have no reference to the gentleman from Arkansas——

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. MACON. The gentleman must make a distinction between unanimous consent and demanding a second upon a motion to suspend the rules. The gentleman knows that it was a foregone conclusion that a second was going to be ordered by a majority, if demanded, and that the bill was going to be passed by a two-thirds vote on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. Therefore, does not the gentleman think it would have been an act of folly for me to ask for a second and thereby waste forty minutes' time of the House when he knows that the result was going to be the same in the end?

Mr. SIMS. I can not complain about the gentleman failing to act when he knew in advance that the action would amount to nothing. I think also that he knew when he objected to unanimous consent that it would amount to nothing because it is suspension day.

Mr. MACON. I did not know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was going to ask for a suspension of the rules when I objected. He had asked for unanimous consent; I had a voice in that matter and I used it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not want the gentleman from Arkansas to understand that I am criticising him. I think he is a full-fledged and very useful Member of the House. I am only calling attention to the action of everybody in the House, the entire body.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLLIDAY].

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the conditions in the State of Washington. I desire to call the attention of this body to the fact that only a few weeks ago this House, by a very decided vote, refused to create an additional judicial district in a State that has four times the population and three times the wealth of the State of Washington. This circumstance simply emphasizes the fact that when an entire delegation of a State can get together it can have almost anything and that no State can expect to get much recognition at the hands of this House where there is a division of opinion among its Members. The people of the State of Indiana came to this House for relief, the people of a great State represented by 13 Congressmen on the floor of this House, and we were denied it on the theory that it might possibly cost thirty or forty dollars a month to pay the salary of an assistant clerk or an assistant marshal. Now we are asked, without any opportunity of investigation, to vote not merely for an assistant clerk or an assistant marshal, but to give a United States judge to a State represented by three Congressmen on the floor of this House, a State that can not possibly do the same business, either in a judicial way or in any other way, that the great Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent does. I am going to oppose and vote against every proposition to create a new judge of a district until this House gets ready to do justice to the State of Indiana.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not personally know whether this judgeship is needed or not. The gentleman who is proposing the bill says it is needed, and I have heard no one say it is not needed, nor have I heard anyone say that Judge Hanford, for whose relief it is given, is not constantly at work; but here is what I have in mind, and what I have had in mind, about creating all of these judgeships, and that is the record of the district judges as to the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law—the records of the southern district of New York, the State of Pennsylvania, and the State of Washington, and you might say there are other States in the same fix. Section 4 of the Sherman antitrust law provides that—

> The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain the violation of this act; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations. Such proceedings may be by way of petition setting forth the case and praying that such violation shall be enjoined or otherwise prohibited. When the parties complained of shall have been duly notified of such petition, the court shall proceed, as soon as may be, to the hearing and determination of the case; and pending such petition and before final decree the court may at any time make such temporary restraining order or prohibition as shall be deemed just in the premises.

Mr. Speaker, I have read that section for the purpose of calling the attention of this House to the fact that that is the equity proposition that this Sherman antitrust law contains. It is the equity practice; it is not the practice in the enforcement of the criminal sections of the statute. It applies to the "circuit courts." There is not a word in the Sherman antitrust law that puts the district attorney or puts the district courts at the mercy or dictation of the Attorney-General of the United States—not a word. The district court enforces the criminal sections. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the Attorney-General's report for last year shows that there was not pending in the State of Washington a single solitary suit under the Sherman antitrust law on July 1, 1907, nor was there pending in the United States court July 1, 1908, a single solitary suit in the State of Washington under that law.

Turn over now to the State of Pennsylvania, who has just been given her additional judge, and you will find that on July 1, 1907, there was one suit pending under the Sherman antitrust law, and on July 1, 1908, there was one suit pending, possibly the same suit that had not been disposed of. Mr.

Speaker, I submit, and I resubmit for the purpose of accentuating, that the federal judges of these United States are not doing their duty in charging the grand juries to investigate the violations of the Sherman antitrust law. You need not lay it all on Attorney-General Bonaparte; you need not lay it on anybody except the district judges that are required by law to obey the law and see that it is faithfully executed. You need not lay it upon the President of the United States, who has great and additional machinery given him, together with more than $750,000 extra that we have given him, and who has great assistance in the officers we have given him, for he has caused more trust suits to be begun than any President. But I say of the judiciary of the United States, in my own State as well as yours, in every State and Territory of the United States, they have not done their duty in aiding Congress and in aiding the President of the United States to enforce the criminal sections of the Sherman antitrust law. In New York—I referred to the other day—I have the record by the Attorney-General for the last year of that court, and I find practically the same delinquency in all the districts of that State as I find in Pennsylvania and Washington and, I may say, in my own State.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to place in the RECORD the tables from the Attorney-General's report, dated December 18, 1908, to which I have alluded, covering the litigation for last year pending under the Sherman antitrust law in Pennsylvania, Washington, New York, and Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do hope, I will say to my friend from the State of Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], and I say it candidly and without the slightest idea of partisanship, that if he gets this new judge, and I take his word for it that a new judge is needed, the first thing that judge will do in the great State that bears such a distinguished name—Washington—is to see to it that the Sherman antitrust law is faithfully executed in that great State.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] if I have that much time remaining.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, it has been my fortune, or perhaps misfortune, to have been chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee to which this bill and others of similar character have been referred for the past five or six years, and I think it due to gentlemen in the House, especially after some of the remarks that have been made, to explain why this bill is reported to the House at this time. At the last session of the last Congress the Senate passed a bill creating two additional circuit judges for the ninth circuit. It came to the House, was referred to the Committee on Judiciary and to the subcommittee of which I had the honor to be chairman.

We then declined to report it, because of insufficient evidence in the Department of Justice to warrant it, although at the time one of the circuit judges was reported ill. In order to assist the committee in its work, however, the Attorney-General agreed to make a thorough investigation of the conditions in the ninth circuit, so that the Judiciary Committee and the House itself might act intelligently if the bill again came before them. That investigation, made by one of the intelligent experts of the department, resulted in a voluminous report, many pages long, showing the absolute necessity that relief be given at least to the western district of Washington.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember that last year the gentleman's committee, I think, or some other committee, reported a bill into the House to transfer Alaska cases so that they might be heard in Washington——

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And not require them to go to San Francisco, and it was then stated that the judges were amply able to take care of this additional business?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. May I state to the gentleman that he is talking about the wrong court?

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the same judges.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But the gentleman is not talking about the same judges. I know, because that was my bill.

Mr. MANN. The circuit court of appeals consists in part of the circuit judge of Washington——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; but not the district courts.

Mr. MANN. This district judge does circuit business.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. The bill to which the gentleman from Illinois refers had to do with the circuit court; this deals with the district court. That bill affected the whole ninth circuit, including California and territory west of the Rocky Mountains. The pending bill has simply to do with the congested condition in the western district of Washington.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, after the investigation and report were made, of which I was speaking, the Attorney-General addressed a letter to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, recommending the creation of an additional district judge because of the conditions existing in that district. It ought to make no difference whether he is paid $6,000 or $9,000, or whether there are 37 circuit judges and 85 United States district judges in the country. Here is a great and growing community the business of whose courts is congested, and the question for this House to settle is, whether, after an investigation has established that fact, proper relief shall be given.

I do not recall, Mr. Speaker, that two more worthy measures have ever been presented to this House by the Judiciary Committee than the one just passed for the western district of Pennsylvania and the one now before the House, presented by the gentleman from Washington. If a new district judge was ever needed anywhere, it is in the western district of Washington.

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Does the gentleman desire to use any more time?

Mr. MACON. I desire to use a minute to ask the gentleman one question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MACON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he will not qualify his remarks concerning this bill by saying, "and the bill which is to be presented to the House in a few moments by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS]."

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Yes; I will include that because of congested conditions in the southern district of New York.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to make inquiry about the necessity for the judge in the western district. Is the court occupied by the litigation affecting those timber grants, and to what extent?

Mr. CUSHMAN. In the western district of Washington we have litigation of all kinds. There has not been an exceptional number of cases regarding the timber grants. Does the gentleman refer to the railroad grants?

Mr. FERRIS. I refer more particularly to the resolution that was passed last year touching the cancellation and the forfeiture of those grants by reason of noncompliance with the terms.

Mr. CUSHMAN. There have been very few of those cases started in our State. There has been a considerable number started in Oregon and a considerable number started in California.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 19655) providing for an additional judge for the southern district of New York, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional judge for the southern district of New York, whose length of term, compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for the judges of said district.

SEC. 2. That that part of section 613 of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows: "and at every such term held by said judge of said eastern district he shall receive the sum of $300, the same to be paid in the manner now prescribed by law for the payment of the expenses of another district judge while holding court in said district," is hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to twenty minutes.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I have here a comparative statement of the work done by, or rather the apportionment of it to, the district judge in the western district of Pennsylvania, for which district you have just passed a bill for an additional judge; the district judge of the western district of Washington, for which you have just passed a bill for an additional judge; and each of the three district judges of the southern district of New York. Of civil cases to which the United States was a party there were terminated last year in the western district of Pennsylvania, 31; in the western district of Washington, 51; in the southern district of New York, 551—an average of 187 per judge; that is, for each district judge of the southern district of New York, three times as many as either of the others. There were left pending in the Pennsylvania district, 70; in the Washington district, 79; in the southern district of New York, 1,030; or an average per district judge for the southern district of New York of 343, more than three times as many per judge as in either of the other districts.

In the criminal cases in the western district of Pennsylvania there were 35 jury trials; in the western district of Washington, 11 jury trials; and in the southern district of New York, 43 jury trials—an average in the southern district of 14 per judge, less than in the western district of Pennsylvania, but more than in the western district of Washington per judge. And there were left pending in the western district of Pennsylvania 73 criminal cases; in the Washington district, 52; and in the southern district of New York, 180—an average of 60 per judge in New York.

Of suits to which the United States was not a party there were disposed of in the western district of Pennsylvania, 218; in the western district of Washington, 249; in the southern district of New York, per judge, 332.

Therefore, in both civil cases to which the United States was a party and in civil cases to which the United States was not a party more cases were disposed of per district judge in the southern district of New York than in either the western district of Pennsylvania or the western district of Washington. And of criminal cases, the southern district of New York disposed of more per district judge than the western district of Washington, although not as many as the western district of Pennsylvania. And I think these statistics prove what I think my friend from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] will agree with, that the need in the southern district of New York is greater than it is in either of the other districts. Those judges were needed——

Mr. MACON. I will agree with the gentleman. I believe his bill is the best bill of the three that have been presented here on this subject this morning.

Mr. PARSONS. It could have no higher encomium.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, somewhere this report—I have not been able to find it this morning, and I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] wrote it—alludes to the burden the Sherman antitrust law imposes upon the courts up there in New York. I want to call your attention to this language. Here it is, and I believe the gentleman wrote:

> So, too, the average time for trial grows longer as the issues become more complicated, as, for instance, cases arising under the Sherman law.

Now, gentlemen, I again call your attention to the fact that the Attorney-General in his last report, dated December, 1908, showed that not a single, solitary suit under the Sherman antitrust law had been brought in the southern district of the State of New York for the past year covered by that report. Now, I want to know, is it harder to do nothing than something in the State of New York in the execution of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman from Tennessee urge that as a reason to oppose this bill?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not particularly; but I just want to remind these district judges that there is such a law on the statute books as the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But I will remind the gentleman that the judges do not bring cases before themselves.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is not what I am talking about. I want them to bring them before the grand jury. They are there to hold court, and I am trying to compel your judge to charge the grand jury about crying evils that have appealed to me and have appealed to Congress. We have given money to the Department of Justice and given additional officers; we have given everything they need and all the courts need [applause], and yet, Mr. Speaker, the district judges of this country are so far removed from the people that they can not be and are not reached by the people. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Notwithstanding all the gentleman has said, we need an additional judge down there in the southern district of New York, the litigation and bankruptcy business are increasing, and I am heartily in favor of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If that judge would enforce the Sherman antitrust law, you would need more than one judge where this great menagerie of trusts feeds and fattens.

The gentleman, Mr. Parsons, in this report which he told me he made, alludes to the tobacco-trust case. That was tried by "circuit" judges, and you had to bring some of them from foreign sections. They took that case after argument along in April or May last year, and they did not decide it until November last. I asked some lawyers about this delay the question, What in the world was the matter, with four circuit judges, they could not dispose of that case, with every authority of law put before their eyes and splendidly argued, where the law and the facts were plain, and yet they did not act until November?

Why, they said that the regular vacation, it is stated in the gentleman's report, was two months and two weeks. I say I asked one of the counsel in that case, as I was greatly interested for the people, what was the matter with four circuit judges that they did not decide the case from April until November, and he said one would take his vacation and another would take a vacation, then all would take a vacation, and that was what was the matter. And even when they brought in the report the last judge that they put on the bench up there decided that the tobacco trust, that everybody in the United States but that judge had decided was a monopoly under that old battered-to-death Knight case, was not a monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, what I am doing is exceedingly disagreeable. I dislike to criticise my brother lawyers or the courts. I want to say that I appeal in the interest of the people of your State and my State, who are scourged by monopoly. I appeal for the upbuild of the morale of the district courts of this country. I appeal for the mighty ocean of law and order and of justice and a righteous condemnation of monopoly that Christ himself would have denounced, and I ask it in the people's interest that monopoly shall not rest upon the people's shoulders and filch from the mouths of wife and child the bread that is their due.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I want to call your attention to the report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the question of monopoly in this country:

> There is an irresistible movement toward concentration in business. We must definitely recognize this as an inevitable economic law. We must also recognize the fact that industrial concentration is already largely accomplished in spite of general statutory prohibition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. Surrender, never. Monopoly exists in New York and elsewhere and is digging under the corner stone of society and the States and the Republic. These courts do not enforce the law, but let them run over the people, and this officer says we can not help it. I say, Charge the grand juries all over the country each session of court, and we will see if we must surrender.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, the statement of the corporation commissioner reminds me of a piece of poetry I learned to parse when at school:

> Wherever God's people erect a house of prayer,
> The devil always erects one there,
> And 'twill be found on examination
> That the latter has the largest congregation.

[Applause.]

Because the devil has the biggest crowd, because he has the largest audience, because he brings about desecration of the law of your country, is it any reason why we should stop printing the Bible or reading the Lord's Prayer or teaching the Ten Commandments, or for the court to omit to enforce this law? Shall we surrender? Never. I stand, Mr. Speaker, for the laws of my country, for even and exact justice. I stand for the Sherman law, and I condemn any judge, whether in Tennessee or elsewhere, or any Member of this House who does not stand the same way and see that the laws are enforced and the people protected from these creatures that flop around in the loins of the law, and who gather that in which is not theirs, but to have which makes the people poor indeed. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just a few words in favor of this bill. And, by the way, I desire to say in reply to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that no one is more in favor of the strict enforcement of the antitrust laws, and for that matter of all laws, than myself; and in order that these laws may be enforced in the federal district having the largest population and doing the most business in the United States, the southern district of New York, it is absolutely necessary, in my opinion, that this bill should pass and that an additional district-court judge be appointed for the southern district of New York. Let me also say that I am in favor of what my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has so eloquently stated, of trying to live up to the precepts of the Bible—the grandest book, as Lincoln said, ever given to man. I heartily concur in that, and I want to say to my friend from Tennessee that there is no place in the world where there are so many Bibles printed and read as in the good city of New York; and in my judgment there is no city where the people, take them all in all, endeavor more earnestly to live up to the teachings of the Great Book than the city of New York. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Speaker, no more about that now. Suffice it for me to say in conclusion that this is an important bill, and I hope it will pass this House unanimously. The southern district of New York urgently needs an additional judge, and in the interest of the due and speedy administration of justice it ought to have it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the southern district of New York needs an additional judge. As one who has had a large experience in legal matters in that State, I want to say to this House that the judges of the southern district of New York have worked faithfully and well and the calendars are crowded. The people are entitled to have the litigation disposed of speedily and as rapidly as can be done consistent with fairness and justice. The bar of the State of New York are heartily in favor of this measure. The merchants and business men of New York who are interested in general litigation, as well as in bankrupt matters, of which there are a great many, demand that there should be an adequate and sufficient force of judges in the southern district of New York.

I would not stand upon this floor and urge the passage of the bill if I did not, through experience and observation, realize the absolute necessity for the measure, and because of such necessity I advocate the passage of the bill.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] has undertaken to treat us to a dissertation upon the Sherman antitrust law. I will say to him that if there be crime committed in the southern district of New York and such crime is brought to the attention of the grand jury in a proper way, the judges there, who are able and painstaking and willing to work, will discharge their duties to the satisfaction of the people and the country. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I take it from what he has said that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] is in no way opposed to the passage of this bill. I am in hearty sympathy with much that he has stated concerning the failure of our courts to deal effectively with a certain class of crime. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York, my colleague [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], that it is the duty of a judge to wait for an accusation by or against anyone before putting the criminal law in motion. It is his business to initiate proceedings when necessary to the vindication of justice and full enforcement of law by charging the grand jury to investigate any conditions likely to show the commission of crime in the territory over which he has jurisdiction. Even though a district attorney be derelict, there is power left in the courts to force action by directing the grand jury to proceed and make investigation on its own motion where there is reason to suspect that the law of the land has been violated.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to say to my colleague that I do not wish to be understood as meaning that the judge should not charge the grand jury on the subject of crime. Of course it is the duty of the judge to charge the grand juries as to their duty to find indictments against violators of the law, and to point out laws said to have been violated, and to insist upon a rigid investigation into alleged commission of crime.

Mr. COCKRAN. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, then, do not the judges do it?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not differ at all from the statement of the gentleman from New York as to his own position as he defines it now, but he criticised the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], as I understood him, for finding grave fault with the failure of our judicial establishment to deal with a certain class of crime. In everything the gentleman from Tennessee said on that head I concur unreservedly.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is largely because I believe there have been many failures by the courts to enforce certain provisions of law that I am perfectly ready to concede the necessity of an additional judge in the southern district of New York. Indeed, I think we want many more than one additional judge. In any political society where adjudication of controversies between its members must be delayed for years, or even for months, I do not think the condition of such a community can be considered fully civilized.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield? Does the gentleman think that the district judges in the city of New York should charge the grand juries to investigate the Tennessee Coal and Iron merger?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I think they should charge the grand jury to investigate violations of every law on the statute books, including that particular law the gentleman mentions. [Applause.] I think that the first business of a court when it impanels a grand jury is to charge that grand body to investigate every violation of any criminal statute. If there be reason to suspect the existence of a crime, such as was established in the case mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee, according to the conclusions of the circuit court itself, the grand jury should be charged to investigate those facts. If the district attorney fail to take the initiative, the grand jury should be directed to act under guidance of the court. That is a familiar principle in the administration of criminal law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell the House and the country why the judges have not charged the grand juries as to the Tennessee Coal and Iron merger?

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I can not explain why the judges have failed——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did they not know it up there?

Mr. COCKRAN. I can not explain why the judges have failed to take certain action; but this much I do know, that the pressure of business might be assigned as an excuse for it, and I am anxious that this ground of excuse be reduced, even if it can not be entirely removed. Given the most industrious judges in the world they could not dispose of the business on that calendar now without a delay of many months—indeed, of many years—and that delay is, in my judgment, not merely an injury to litigants—it is a blot on our political system, a stain on our civilization. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, no country can be counted entirely civilized where the adjudication of controversies must be delayed over several years. I say there is only a very slight degree of difference between justice sold and justice long delayed. Here we have justice delayed over months and years, and the only prospect of relief in any form lies in adopting this proposal now before the House. It is not a complete remedy, it is not an adequate remedy, but I welcome it for what it is worth, and therefore I echo the hope expressed by my colleague from New York [Mr. SULZER], that this bill will pass without a single dissenting voice. At the same time I venture to express an earnest hope that this House or the next House will take effective measures to establish some form of judicial procedure which will enable every controversy begun in a court of the United States to be heard and finally determined within a specified and reasonable limit of time. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want just to make a little statement, and then I am through. It is the duty of the district judge when he knows that there is "probable cause to believe" that a violation of law has been committed to charge his grand jury to investigate it. Is there a man in this House that challenges me in that statement? It is laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Licorice Trust case (201 U. S. R., p. 43, Hull v. Hinkle), and that has always been the law in this country. Yet they have not charged the grand jury in New York as to the tobacco trust matter, though already enjoined by the federal circuit court—three judges out of four deciding it was a violation of this law, of dangerous capacity and action. They have not charged the jury on the Tennessee Coal and Iron merger, and that occurred in November, 1907. The New York district courts have been silent in these cases—have failed to do their duty—though there is more than "probable cause to believe." The gentleman asks me if I am criticising the judge for not charging the grand jury, and I say that I am; and I now ask him, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], why his great judges have not charged the grand jury as to the tobacco trust case and as to the Tennessee Coal and Iron merger, and I yield the gentleman one minute to tell the House why they have not done so.

Mr. SULZER. Get up and tell him they are too busy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Speaker, if they had charged the jury under this law as they should have done and the federal judges all over this country, I would have been glad to have remained silent and not have brought to the attention of this country these delinquencies about which this Congress is complaining, and about which the people of this country are wondering. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I take it that when this New York judge is appointed he will be one of four to charge the grand jury to make these investigations, and if the district attorney and these judges do not do their duty they ought to be impeached. Why has not the grand jury itself acted? The grand jury can do so, whether the court charges it or not, and the Federal Supreme Court so held in the Henkle case I already cited. The grand juries have been silent and seem to be dominated by the district attorneys. The district attorney has been silent, and the district judges have been silent. My God, why such silence in New York City, the great hatchery of monopoly? Why silent anywhere, for unlawful trusts are in the saddle all over the land. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 27894) amending an act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, approved June 29, 1906, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 7 of section 20 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906, be amended so that said paragraph as so amended will read as follows:

"PAR. 7. Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any record or memoranda kept by a carrier, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, or memoranda, or who shall willfully neglect or fail to make full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not less than one year nor more than three years, or both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That the commission may in its discretion issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, or documents of carriers which may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time such books, papers, or documents shall be preserved."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York to twenty minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, under the interstate-commerce law the railroads are forbidden to destroy any record, paper, or memoranda of any kind whatever. It was not thought at the time of the passage of the law that there might come a time when these immaterial papers, those no longer useful to the Government, would accumulate in such large quantities as to be an actual burden to the railroads and without any possible advantage to the people. Therefore the commission have asked that they be given authority to permit the destruction of certain papers or memoranda and other records which, in their judgment, are no longer needed and prescribe a time during which the railroad companies must keep all records. I can not better illustrate the need of this measure than to ask the Clerk to read Commissioner Harlan's letter to Congressman MANN, which sets forth the case in full.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 6, 1909.

DEAR MR. MANN: I address this letter to you in the hope that you may find the matter of interest and that it may enlist your aid. It is certainly one that demands prompt attention.

The twentieth section of the act to regulate commerce contains a paragraph making it a misdemeanor for any person, among other things, to destroy any account, record, or memoranda of the facts and transactions kept by a common carrier. For your convenience I inclose a copy of the paragraph in question. The result of the provision has been to impose a very great hardship upon the railroads. As you will observe, it is both peremptory and comprehensive, and under its terms the carriers have felt that they could not destroy any of their records of any kind. We have been appealed to for relief. Railroad documents and papers accumulate in almost inconceivable numbers in short periods of time. If I am not mistaken, it was stated by an official of the Pennsylvania Railroad that its waybills accumulate to the extent of several millions a month. And it has been compelled to rent warehouses in which to store such documents in order to comply with the requirements of the paragraph to which I refer. The same is true of other carriers; all are finding it most burdensome to comply with that provision in the law.

The commission, in its last annual report, as you will see at page 87, recommends that authority be given it to issue orders from time to time prescribing the documents that may be destroyed after a given period and also prescribing the period of time during which documents shall be retained. And we very much hope that some amendatory act will give us the power to relieve the carriers of this unnecessary burden. We would, of course, act only after a very careful consideration of the matter, and would prescribe a definite period of years—in some cases as much as twenty years—for the preservation of documents that ought to be available for such periods of time. There are many documents, however, the force and effect of which is carried into books of account or otherwise recorded and become useless after one year, or even shorter periods of time. There are many duplicates that could be destroyed after a period, even, of six months.

I venture to inclose a draft of a bill covering my personal view of the amendment that should be made, and although I understand that it is not likely that any special legislation will be enacted at this session, it would, in my judgment, be a real public service if some such measure could be put through.

I shall be in conference on Monday and Tuesday, and leave on Tuesday night for the West. But should you care to have further information and will write me to that effect here, Mr. Adams or some one else who is familiar with the matter will call upon you.

Very sincerely, yours,

JAS. S. HARLAN, Commissioner.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, unless some one desires to ask a question, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to have anything to say on this bill, except this: That it is a unanimous report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. There is no appropriation carried with it; it is simply to permit the railroads of the country to destroy useless papers under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, papers that they now are required by law to retain in their possession. The bill is entirely proper, in my opinion, and there should be no opposition to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

ENLARGING INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28072, the rules be suspended, and the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, by direction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, moves that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the following bill and that the same do pass. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28072) to enlarge the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 24 of the act to regulate commerce, approved June 29, 1906, be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the commissioners and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1915; one for a term expiring December 31, 1916. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Georgia to twenty minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to enlarge the Interstate Commerce Commission by adding to it two members. In the railroad rate bill which passed this House in 1906, known as the "Hepburn bill," there was a provision for 9 commissioners. The Senate insisted that the number be reduced to 7. That opinion prevailed, but the subsequent course of business before the commission has shown the wisdom of the action of the House. The report of the commission filed on the 24th day of December last showed that during the last year there was an increase of business over the year before in formal complaints of about 33 per cent; of informal complaints, over 100 per cent. That proportion of increase of business, important and unimportant, will probably continue so far as we can foresee into the future. In addition to that most important and, indeed, main business of the commission, Congress has placed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission a great deal of responsibility in addition to the administration and enforcement of the rate law, such as laws regulating traffic in interstate commerce, laws regulating the enforcement of safety appliances and the experiments upon safety appliances, the law regulating the hours of labor in transportation known as the "sixteen-hour law," the law governing the transportation of explosives, the law regulating the street-car business in the District of Columbia, and various miscellaneous matters.

Also Congress has ordered, from time to time, investigations of various sorts, and sometimes of great importance, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Some are pending now. Many investigations are ordered by the commission itself, upon its own initiative, which are always liable to involve matters of very great importance and to require a large amount of time. In addition to these classes of public business, the commission is obliged, from time to time, to take up other matters of great importance, like that of uniform bills of lading, which involve the vast commerce of the country and where a great deal of time and attention are necessarily given by the commission. Then, the commission is seeking to bring about a uniform classification of freight and a physical valuation of all railroad property. Now, all of these things require a great deal of work by the commission, and every subject is of tremendous importance, present and future, to our people. Now, those of you who have watched the business of the commission during the last year will know that a great many of these investigations and examinations have not been able to be made by members of the commission themselves.

The commissioners have been obliged, owing to the great pressure of business, to have many of these important investigations conducted by examiners employed by the commission, who are not responsible to the Congress at all, who are mere employees and subordinates of the commission, and we deem it necessary that these investigations, that these great questions before that commission, be examined and personally determined in the proper way by the proper officials, whom we designate and who are accountable to us, and that the commission should have sufficient force to do that very work, however much may accumulate through pressure of business or may be ordered by Congress.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman explain what an informal complaint is?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. It is a complaint filed orally or by letter, and not in the form that is usually presented to the commissioner by trained lawyers, and upon forms prescribed by practice or the commission.

Mr. MADDEN. As to an overcharge in freight?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Anything of that kind.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House how many corrections have been made in the rates of freight fixed by the railroad companies on complaint to the commission during the last year?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The report shows that during the last year 4,640 were filed. There were 3,515 of these adjusted by the commission and 27 transferred to the formal docket and there are 1,288 yet pending.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House what good could come from the increase in the number of the commissioners until the commission is given sufficient power to fix the freight rates before they go into force and are obliged to wait for the complaint?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I thought I made that clear. The commission has this great variety of work to do that is now prescribed by law. This vast mass of complaints, concerning all sorts of subjects, is forwarded to the commission, very many every day. It is necessary for the vast business of the country to be properly transacted that these complaints be acted upon at once. The commission has done the very best it could, and is handling rapidly and satisfactorily this vast mass of business. In the meantime there is the enforcement of this great variety of other laws that must be looked after at once, in order to make them of any use to and properly protect the people. Now, this enforcement must be supervised by the commissioners themselves. It will not do to have the enforcement of a bill like the bills regulating the hours of labor, regulating safety appliances, or the carriage of explosives, by subordinates. These matters are of great importance, and people want that work done by men of character and ability, nominated by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and responsible to Congress. And for that reason the business can not be well done in the future unless this number of commissioners be increased.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that the most important duty intended to be imposed upon the commission was the regulation of railroad freight rates, in which every citizen of the country is interested?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the bulk of their work.

Mr. MADDEN. Do they regulate the freight rates?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Why, yes. They regulate them as well as they can.

Mr. MADDEN. Can they regulate them?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes. They are giving very good satisfaction within the scope of the duties that they have impressed upon them.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they any power to regulate them under the law?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Why, yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What are the powers?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, that does not come within the scope of this bill, but I will be glad to tell the gentleman. When a complaint comes before the commission involving the reasonableness of the rate, they have a right to fix the rate. That was the essence of the Hepburn bill passed by Congress in 1906.

Mr. MADDEN. Have they any power except when a complaint is filed?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly. Complaint must be filed preliminary to a hearing.

Mr. MADDEN. It takes generally about a year or two before the case is tried, and conditions have all changed before the case is heard.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The report of the commission does not show that, but just the contrary stated by the gentleman. The commission is doing the best it can with the facilities at hand, and it has heard the cases and has decided the great bulk of them.

Mr. SIMS rose.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Is there any limit as to the age of gentlemen who may be appointed on this commission?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. No; not in the law.

Mr. SIMS. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be a limit? If the work is so great it can not now be discharged by the seven men there, that there should be a limit, and no one should be appointed on the commission who is over 50 years old?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Some of the best men on that commission are over that age, and we would not undertake to place that arbitrary limit. I think that has been one of the chief objections in the civil-service regulations that have been effective throughout the country—the arbitrary age limit, excluding some of the very best obtainable talent in the country.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has made an argument here in support of his bill based upon the statement that they are physically and mentally incapable of doing the vast amount of work.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, I dislike to have the gentleman quote me unfairly.

Mr. SIMS. Why not have a limit upon the age which will guarantee to the public vitality, physical and mental, so that they may discharge the duties of the position.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. There has been absolutely no complaint about the personnel of this commission. They are good men—able, competent, hard-working men. They are doing the tremendous work imposed upon them, and they are doing it well, as satisfactorily as can be expected considering the great difficulties of that work. The only relief that is possible is to give them a sufficient number, so that the work can be properly done.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think that before any bill is enacted into law creating additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners the commission which is now in existence ought to be given the power to do the things for which it was originally created, namely, to decide what a reasonable rate is before the railroads of the country are allowed to put that rate into force. Until that is done, any addition to the membership of the commission will simply be an addition to an already useless expense. The most important thing to-day before the American people is the question of whether the railroads are to be permitted to tax the people to the extent of their desires. The purpose of the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission originally was to prevent the railroad companies from exacting unjust railroad rates. Since the enactment of the so-called "Hepburn law" the railroad companies have increased indiscriminately, unjustly, and unjustifiably the railroad rates throughout every section of the Union, and the Interstate Commerce Commission as at present constituted is powerless to regulate these rates before they become effective.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Georgia use some of his time?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to add two members to the Interstate Commerce Commission, making the number nine instead of seven. Ordinarily I am not in favor of enlarging the size of commissions nor increasing the number of officers nor their salaries. When the number was increased to seven I opposed it, believing that five competent men would form an efficient and satisfactory commission, but increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission has very materially increased their work. They are compelled to make numerous investigations of very important and laborious character. Their hearings are numerous, requiring much time and considerable study. Of course enlarging the number would not operate to relieve the situation if the commission were required to sit together in all hearings and investigations, but that is not necessary. On the contrary, the members divide up into sections, and often have different hearings going on at the same time in different parts of the United States. The enlargement proposed in this bill will enable the commission to separate itself into three subdivisions of three members each, so as to conduct three hearings and investigations at the same time. The large majority of the matters coming before them will not demand the united attention of the entire commission, but only matters involving differences of opinion need be referred to the full commission, so the different subdivisions of three members, each disposing finally of the consideration of numbers of matters, will leave a much smaller number involving such difficulties and disputes as to require consideration by the entire commission. Much more work can thus be done, and it is absolutely necessary that much more should be done in order that the benefits hoped for may be realized from our rate legislation.

We hear and read a great deal of late about the defects in that regulation. Of course the particular corporations whose conspicuous misdeeds contributed most to make rate regulation necessary objected most strenuously to that or any other regulation, and they did not set out to be satisfied with that or any other regulation. They deny their public capacity, they deny that they have any reciprocal obligations to the public in turn for the franchises and monopolistic privileges which they enjoy. In effect, they claim that the transportation of freight or passengers is an insensate commodity, to be disposed of on the market like other merchandise, combating flatly the well-established and fundemental doctrine that their relationship to the public is practically the same as that of any other officer charged with the responsibility of performing service for the public. I do not think that all corporations profess these opinions, nor do I believe that all corporations render such legislation necessary. As corporations are owned and conducted by mortal men, they are good or bad according to the character of the men who control them. Of course different men expected to accomplish different things by the attempted rate regulation. Different reformers desired different reforms to remedy different evils. I did not pose as a professional rate reformer myself, but sought correction of specific evils. I have always believed that all the people of this country were alike fellow-citizens, with the right to live and move and have their being, and own any kind of legitimate property that they were able to own, carry on any kind of lawful business, and not only be protected in their holdings and operations but also enjoy the right to participate in the Government, and vote and petition, and speak and write, and exercise their influence in all legitimate ways in the consideration of all legislation affecting their own property or the property of their fellow-citizens without regard to kind or character, whether real, personal, mixed, rolling, stationary, on paper, or on the ground. There were some practical questions of vital importance to a great many local communities. For some reasons, possibly one of them being the consolidation and remoteness of ownership, which rendered it impossible for the owners and bondholders to see far enough to discover local trouble, local injustice, and inconvenience were inflicted on many communities.

Good towns, with large commerce and intelligent population, having much business abroad and often visited by many people from abroad, were unjustly discriminated against. Some of them by consolidation were bottled up, deprived of necessary passenger and mail facilities, and charged a higher freight rate than was charged to haul the same goods in the same direction through those towns and on to more distant points. Those were the main difficulties that fell under my observation and moved me to support an amendment authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to correct those evils. The evil as to passenger and mail connections was partially due to the effort to make fast schedules for through trains. Of course that is important to people who want to hurry across the country for long distances with as much haste and as little discomfort as possible, but they are not the people who control the legislative and legal and judicial and commercial weather for the railroads. The Boston drummer or the California or Florida tourist have very little influence with that local sentiment which must exist in whatever humor in a thousand localities between Boston and San Francisco. To that local sentiment the carriers are beholden in many ways. If their managers were wise enough to take notice of it and show a little intelligent consideration for the wishes and conveniences of the people living around those local stations a mere trifle in expense or apparent loss of revenue would produce a degree of popularity and prosperity all along the line that would be pleasing and profitable to the carrier, decrease the number and the character of complaints, minimize the amount of regulation demanded, greatly reduce the amount of litigation, and reverse the character of the verdicts. It is a matter of constant wonder to me that some of the carriers are so stupid or obstinate as to fail to see the facts here referred to.

There is one great mistake, in my judgment, the railroads make that adds to the difficulty and discontent about freight rates. When they pretend to operate on a mileage basis they do not make the initial charge large enough to permit of proper gradations in the charges to successive stations on long routes. They fail to take into consideration and charge enough for the initial care and handling and the terminal care and unloading. Those items are substantially the same for all distances and make up really the most troublesome part of the carrier's duty in handling freight. If a proper charge were made to begin with—for instance, to the first station on the line—then an infinitesimal addition in the rate to all successive stations would aid very materially in solving the problem of fair rates to all stations and minimize the danger of complaints against that evil, always obnoxious—discrimination in rates between two neighboring stations. Nothing in my mind can make a jobber lose his temper quicker or more justifiably than for a train of cars coming from the same point to leave for him a carload of goods and then run on to a station 40 miles farther in the same direction and leave another car at a rate of freight so much less that the latter consignee is able to ship back on a local train and undersell the first-named jobber in his own town. There is only one other thing that approximates it in wrath-producing efficiency, and that is for a number of good towns, who care more for communication with their county seats, their state capitals, or their immediate markets than they do for mail from Boston or passenger connections across the continent, to have to wait half the day or half the night, often without certain knowledge of the exact time to be lost, for a train either to take them home or to bring them their mail, or pay them, laid out on a side track.

A little intelligent good sense would have relieved all of these troubles and helped the carriers in every respect in proportion as they benefited and pleased their local patrons. "There is that that scattereth abroad and yet maketh rich; there is that withholdeth more than is meet, yet tendeth to poverty." There were other reformers who saw a great many other evils and sought to correct them. Well, I have no disposition to oppose any of those reforms, but I did not think it proper to devote time and attention to them at the expense of those that I considered more important. For instance, there is a great outcry about watered stocks and bonds and overcapitalization. The law undoubtedly ought to provide ample means for punishing surely, swiftly, and severely all the malefactors who swindle their fellow-men in that or any other way.

It is undoubtedly an outrage utterly inexcusable to burden legitimate traffic with exactions to pay unearned returns on entirely fictitious capital. Of course the doctrine of selfishness, coupled with power, alone supports the outrage, as in the case of some other vicious practices conspicuous of late years in this Government where certain people are permitted by law to destroy for their own benefit the business and opportunity of their fellow-citizens. A striking instance is the case of robber protective tariff which prostitutes the taxing function of the Government so as, without putting one dollar into the Treasury of the country, to compel honest industry to pay enormous tribute to government favorites or go out of business, or pay enormously higher for the necessaries of life than in the natural course of honest trade they would have to pay but for the dishonest and unnatural scheme foisted upon them to force them to pay unjust prices to such special beneficiaries.

There are other reformers who devote attention to seeking physical valuation of railroad properties. That is all right for some purposes. When you know how much a road is worth you are in possession of one important circumstance to enable those charged with that duty to pass on the proper rate and facilities that should be required on that road; but that fact in itself does not alone furnish an infallible basis, because one road running directly between two points which are connected by another road over a more circuitous route may not have cost near so much as the longer road, and yet, by its facility to transact business more rapidly and cheaply, it may be more valuable than the other, if judged by its net income, which would appear to me to be a more proper criterion. It is also valuable to have such valuation for the purposes of just and fair taxation. It is darkly insinuated that some railroad men are as bad as other folks about dodging their taxes. That is another place where the same kind of human nature crops out, and a man who cultivates a studied reserve about extravagantly pricing his property is as liable to withhold from the Government taxes due on railroad property as are other people in case of land, jewelry, or any other property.

There is another noticeable matter. When the Hepburn rate bill was under consideration, for several years violently opposed by various railroad authorities, it was denied that the Federal Government had anything to do with them, and they were the most patriotic, democratic, local self-government, liberty-loving, state-rights advocates I ever heard talk. We understood that if they were rid of free passes a 2-cent passenger rate would afford satisfactory returns; that counting out the deadheads they hardly realized 2 cents a mile on their passengers; that even as it was, hauling deadheads, many passenger trains ran through the country with only a small per cent of the seats occupied. When we adopted the Hepburn bill, we did not merely authorize the railroads to abolish free passes, but actually did it for them, and the States began to provide for the reduction of passenger rates.

Then those self-same railroad magnates became the most violent federalists and resisted in the federal courts the action of the very state sovereignties which they had formerly lauded, and when it was proposed in Congress to provide for uniformity as to lower rates those same magnates appeared with the most lugubrious countenances to make prolonged and wailing protestations as to the utter ruin facing carriers if compelled to adopt a lower rate. Yet, strange to say, the strong roads running through populous communities did not stress their own inability, but argued the inability of other weaker roads in more remote and sparsely settled regions to stand the reduction in rates. Yet one fact stood out prominent through it all—that those roads which permitted lower rates carried their trains loaded with passengers and realized handsome returns from their business, and that the roads which did put the reductions in force, even over their protest in regions where they claimed that they could not stand it, found their passenger receipts were increased. It is not insisted, however, that Congressmen can be dogmatic or arbitrary about fixing rates. Yet there is one thing that we ought to insist on: Transportation, being a public service, uniformly rendered alike to all, ought to be rendered at the same price to all comers, high, low, rich, or poor, where the same facilities are furnished, whether the ride is for a hundred miles or a thousand, and I for one will never consent to any other arrangement. Some of the railroads have acted very foolishly in making ill-tempered efforts at reprisal on the people for the agitation of the rate legislation. Where they have issued mileage books, even at a rate discriminatory in price as against the local travel by ticket or cash fare, some of them have put unnecessary conditions and inconveniences upon the scheme.

They have ceased to allow a man in a hurry to get on a car and have his mileage book pay his fare to the conductor. He must go into the depot and exchange his mileage coupons for a ticket, and look after his baggage check, with as much detail and particularity and trouble as if he paid cash each time for his ticket. Those are the very things that travelers desire to avoid, and for that reason would buy mileage books at the same price or even higher than charged for local travel. I have never understood any reason for this, except the pretense that dishonest passengers may juggle with conductors to knock down fares more easily than they can with ticket agents. I do not know whether ticket agents are more honest than conductors or not. I doubt it. If they are, they are good men, for in the last forty years I have seen and ridden with hundreds of conductors, and I do not believe that in any walk of life or avenue of business I have ever known a higher class of men—uniformly polite, honorable, and vigilant.

Another defect that is not only without excuse, but subjects the carriers to criticism and ill will sometimes out of proportion to any consideration on which they may base it; that is, their refusal, in some instances, to sell through tickets and check baggage beyond connecting points. I have never seen nor heard a reason for it that the carrier could not have obviated by proper diligence in making joint rates and filing the same. It has been resented by the people as an effort by the railroads to hit back for adverse agitation, and the popular resentment, as in some other cases, may have exceeded the provocation.

These observations are meant in good will, in the hope that some of the erring corporation men may see proper to join others who are already doing right in trying to please and accommodate the people, thereby reducing the necessities for litigation or legislation and making the mutual transactions of the railroads and the people at once more profitable and more satisfactory to all concerned. There is no use for railroad authorities to try to fool anybody or themselves by remarking that points are not on their lines, and therefore they have no jurisdiction to make arrangements about them, nor by claiming that they are restricted by any laws or regulations from promoting the convenience of the people and rendering them fair treatment. Everybody knows that all the railroad interests are in a manner allied, not only from financial conditions in this country, but owing to the nature of their property and the peculiar business in which they are engaged. While they have no power to make unrighteous pools and combinations to destroy commercial points or rival lines, yet they can mutually consider the convenience and interest of the people, promote their own convenient and prompt connections, and arrange for joint routes of travel and freight to all points, in all directions, anywhere. A proper manifestation of a desire in that direction expressed in honest effort will go far to improve their standing before the commission, before the courts, with Congress and the state legislatures, and above all, with the people, who are at last, in their local communities, the final arbiters of the prosperity or adversity of the railroads, which are in position to turn to serve or to ruin their patrons.

Whatever their grievances may be, it behooves the people to take notice that legislation, however wise, specific, and comprehensive, will not alone suffice to redress their wrongs. The strong point about railroads is, they prepare to back up their policies by the most able counsel the country affords. In every judicial circuit the very ablest lawyers are engaged by the railroads and educated in their service for their benefit. All the people together are richer than all the railroads. The people support all the railroads; the law is, and should be, impartially administered between the people regardless of the character of their property or vocations, but no law will enforce itself. It must be invoked before the courts can administer it. If other people will stand the trouble and expense, as railroad managers do, to employ and pay good lawyers, it will be found that most of the trouble can be adjusted or avoided with very little additional legislation. The principles of right and justice are eternal. The law should be, and generally is, based upon those principles. People litigate about everything else under the sun, but think only of legislation when it comes to dealing with the railroads. The truth is, I have known few instances of injustice that could not have been redressed in the courthouse if the same legal talent had been engaged against the railroads that was employed in their favor. So, while I admonish the railroads to avoid the necessity of legislation or litigation by such fair treatment as will conciliate the favor of the public, I, at the same time, exhort all the other people to devote a little of their money and energy to compelling the railroads to do right by employing some of the good lawyers themselves, and invoking the justice and the power of the courts and commissions, both state and federal. Valuable amendments have recently provided for expediting proceedings in courts and before the commission in rate cases, of which injured communities should avail themselves by retaining lawyers and instituting proceedings.

I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I listened with entire accord to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, and I wish to add something to them. I believe if we increase this commission, there ought to be a restriction providing that the new members placed upon it shall not at the very outside be over 50 years of age. As a member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service I have discovered that we are up against the proposition now of providing a civil pension list for employees of the Government who have grown old in the service of the Government. The other day we ran across a proposition for a retirement pension for our circuit judges, or district judges raised one grade in order to retire them. That question—the question of a civil pension list—is growing in magnitude and menace, and increases in size as the Government increases in its own magnitude, and we are coming face to face with the proposition whether this Government shall have a retired list of civil pensioners so large that it would stand comparison with our army pensions. So it seems to me that in increasing this commission there ought to be a provision limiting the age at which appointments shall be made, for the effectiveness of the service to which they are devoted. Not only that; I doubt the wisdom of increasing the body called the Interstate Commerce Commission until we have made some law to render their action effective. It has been well said by the gentleman from Illinois that since the passage of the last noted, almost notorious, railroad act, the act of 1906, the railroads, instead of being held down to lower rates of freight, have gradually and generally increased their rates of freight, and there has been no power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to prevent it. When the commission undertakes to reduce those rates upon complaint of citizens, it takes not a week or a year but sometimes years and years in order to accomplish a reduction in a single schedule; and, then, under the law as it stands now, after three weeks' application of the schedule fixed by the commission under a hearing, the railroads may raise that rate without notice, notification to, or consent of the commission. We ought to have a law providing that no rate now in existence shall be raised without the consent of the commission.

But we can get no law requiring the valuation of railroad properties. We can get no law requiring the consent of the railroad commission to any raising of rates. What good does it do to fix a rate to-day if it may be raised without the consent of the commission to-morrow? What good does it do to have nine members of a commission to regulate this thing, when the railroads may, in utter disregard of the findings to-day, raise those rates to-morrow? It seems to me we have been like children playing with machinery they did not know anything about. We should have adopted some great principles and made them applicable to railroad rates, but we have left the maelstrom of multitudinous rates to be fixed by the railroads and regulated by the commission; and no commission, though it consisted of a hundred men, can ever be able to investigate the multitude of rates that the roads promulgate. They have no principles by which to be guided. They can charge twice as much for a hundred-mile haul as they do for a thousand-mile haul, and it is not illegal. We have refused or failed to adopt great principles to regulate and restrict that would hold down the railroad rates or prevent discrimination between places; and we want to commit the subject to an enlarged commission, for them to look over a field of vast area and attempt to enforce an utterly impossible law. That is the way we have handled the question. Now, I shall oppose the addition of more members, unless those members are required to be at least moderately strong in health as well as in mind, and of a reasonable age, not ready to be retired. They should not be over 50 years old, and they should be active intellectually and physically, and their number should not be increased until their labors can be made effectual when once performed.

Mr. ADAMSON. If any other gentleman desires to be recognized in opposition to the bill, I will be glad to yield time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like one minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, with the whole country clamoring for an enlargement of the law, it is giving them worse than a stone when they ask for bread for this Congress merely to enlarge the commission. Therefore I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] for five minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, if the commissioners are not able to do the work on account of its volume, the number ought to be increased. I for one have no objection to adding any useful powers to the commission that it does not now have; but if an increase is demanded on account of the inability of the present number to do the work, why, then, in all reason, there ought to be some age limit to the members to be added that will guarantee that that argument is a sincere one, and that the statement is a true one and really the cause of the legislation proposed by this bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that the work of the commission—the most of the work—is not done by the commission sitting as one body, but by different members of the commission having hearings, like an ordinary nisi prius judge, and making recommendations to the commission, and that they are all engaged in that work?

Mr. SIMS. I so understand; and that reenforces my argument, that each member of the commission should be able of himself to perform in the highest degree of efficiency all the work required of him.

Mr. MANN. They are. Each member of the commission is so qualified now.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that. The bill seeks to add new members to the commission, increasing it. Now, why not have an age limit that will guarantee a reasonable number of years of service of the highest order, both with reference to mental and physical endurance. I do not know who are going to be applicants for these positions. I do not know whether anybody is staked out or not; but if the object of this bill is to make a place for some man, I do not care who he is, or how great his efficiency, we should put on a limitation of age of some kind, whether it be 50, 55, or 60 years. I understand in appointing members of the federal judiciary there is a rule by which the President nominates no man exceeding 60 years of age.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit one suggestion there?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. This is different from the judiciary, where they retire them on full pay. That certainly has no application when we have no retirement in connection with the commission.

Mr. SIMS. I understand that. Why should not the great committee, of which the gentleman is so able and shining a member, agree to an amendment making 50 years as the age limit; and, if that is too low, 55; or, if that is too low, make it 60 years, so that it may be effective in the legislation as to the two commissioners created hereby.

Mr. MANN. They might want to put the gentleman on the commission.

Mr. SIMS. There is no probability of that. However, I am over 50, but under 60 years of age.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will never be 60, if he lives one hundred years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Can the gentleman think of a man of 50 or 55 years who can excel the work that Francis M. Cockrell, of Missouri, is doing on that commission?

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no necessity for bringing up a personal case. If my argument fits Francis M. Cockrell, let it fit him, or any other man.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He is doing as good and as much work on that commission as any other member of the commission.

Mr. SIMS. I do not question that for a moment, and the gentleman need not bring up his name because he is a Democrat. Sometimes a man of 80 years of age will do as much or more work than another who is 50 years; but why not have an age limit to this thing, guaranteeing physical and mental fitness to discharge the duties of the office? The very fact that gentlemen are not willing to accept a reasonable age limit seems to carry with it the suggestion that the idea of fitness of the highest order is not to be regarded; and after this discussion with reference to such an amendment, an adverse action of the House will indicate to the appointing power that these positions were made by Congress without reference to age. We know as a rule that increasing old age tends to inefficiency; that there ought to be an age limit put in this bill which will insure a high degree of physical and mental efficiency.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think there ought to be an age limit of Members of Congress?

Mr. SIMS. The people put that on; and the term is for only two years, anyway.

Mr. MANN. There is no age limit, except their opinion.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it may be impolite for me to endeavor to reply to gentlemen to whom I have yielded time, but when they talk about an age limit they touch upon a tender subject to sensitive Members of this House. [Laughter.] There is nothing in this bill about age qualifications for membership on the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I am glad of it. I should certainly object to the limit being placed as low as fifty years, for that would shut me out, and I shall never admit the suggestion of my incompetency from age or decrepitude for that or any other public service. [Laughter.] How calamitous to even contemplate; God save the mark and avert the dread possibility; but after his able and distinguished services here, if ten or fifteen years hence the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] should happen by unaccountable error, carelessness, or hallucination of his constituents to fall outside the breastworks in a congressional election and the President should patriotically endeavor to make restitution for the mistake of his constituents by offering to restore his eminent talents to the public service by appointing him on this commission, would anybody say that he was too old? I would indignantly deny the allegation and fiercely defy the alligator. Yea, verily, I would fight him with cannon and gatling guns and everything else for such a vile assault on my young, vigorous, and virile friend. [Laughter and applause.]

It is said that some boys are prone to think themselves smart and regard old men as foolish fogies. It has even been said that no boy, until he reaches the age of 40 years, ever comes to believe that his father had any sense at all. I regard this as an exaggeration, because I know a good many boys who are really sensible, practical, and tractable. On sufficient authority I believe that we need "old men for counsel and young men for war." I utterly scout that old cynical stanza—

> Unless it also means growing wise and good,
> I can not respect you for growing old;
> It is a path you fain would avoid if you could,
> And it means growing ugly, crabid, and cold.

I believe some old men are right good citizens, still very useful in a great many ways and worthy to be respected and preserved among us a little while longer. In fact, I know some men 75 years old who are really smarter, abler, and physically more active than some younger men who do not talk like they believe it. I shall vote for this bill and shall not regard it as any mistake or calamity if some of my old friends in this House should be appointed to the new positions created. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to say anything on this subject at all until I heard the argument of several gentlemen in opposition to the interstate-commerce law. Most of the discussion has been against the general law rather than against the proposed amendment. Of course, if it is conceded that the interstate-commerce law is a failure, it is nonsense to think of increasing the number of commissioners. But I deny that the interstate-commerce law is a failure or that it has failed in any important or material particular. I am ready to admit that that bill is not perfect.

The original proponents of the interstate-commerce law did not claim perfection for it. They knew it was aimed at giant evils intrenched in power. They were fearful that every obstacle would be thrown in the way of its enforcement; they somewhat understood the magnitude of the work that would devolve upon the commission; they realized that it was a compromise between those who would do nothing and those who would go too far, but they felt that it was a step in the direction of justice to the people in their relations to common carriers, and their faith in this particular has been realized. About this there can be no intelligent doubt.

Gentlemen say that rates have been raised since the passage of the law. True, but they were being raised before, and the law did not encourage higher rates. It has been the only barrier against them. Before the act of 1906 only a ten days' notice of raise was required; since then it has required thirty days' notice. Before there was no opportunity for an aggrieved shipper to attack unjust rates through a commission. Now complaint can be made to the commission and it can hear and determine; and if a raised rate is found unjust, reparation to the shipper is ordered. Hundreds of complaints have been made and many rates have been reduced. Hundreds more have been reduced on the advice of the commission without formal order.

The commission can only act on complaint. This was expressly provided in the law after full and long discussion before the committee and the Congress. It was thought best that this should be so, and I still think it is wise.

I have no doubt some rates have been improperly raised, the carriers having taken advantage of the panic as an excuse to raise them; but some raises have been found necessary to meet cost of improvements and operation and some for the purpose of adjustment. But what would have happened if the commission had not been empowered to reduce rates on complaint and after hearing?

Mr. Speaker, the law is imperfect, and I have no doubt a revision of it will be made during the next Congress. Many amendments have already been proposed; I myself have offered three, and I have others in mind. One would reach the complaint which gentlemen make. I would permit any shipper to complain against a proposed higher rate, notice of which having been given by the carrier, and at any time after such notice is given. Thus opportunity would be afforded for a determination of the reasonableness of the rate before it took effect.

Mr. Speaker, it has seemed the part of wisdom for Congress to allow this law to remain unchanged long enough to discover its real defects, and thus afford information for intelligent revision. It has been a statute about two years, during which the commission has been organizing its work and perfecting its plans. In the meanwhile Congress has been piling new and difficult duties upon it. The law will be perfected and the great benefits already enjoyed will be thereby increased.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman's bill to which he refers permit any party to make complaint against the rates when the roads propose to raise them? Does it provide that the commission may enjoin the raise until they hear and decide the question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It may on a prima facie showing.

Mr. HARDY. Without going to the trouble of getting an injunction?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The commission can enjoin the rate from going into effect.

Mr. HARDY. You give them by the bill the power to enjoin the raise until it is decided?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It gives the commission the right to enjoin the rate.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, just one word more. The objection that is made that there should be an age limit is met by the terms of the bill itself. The law provides that these terms shall be for seven years. At the end of that term of seven years the power is left to the President and to the Senate to determine whether that officeholder or another appointee shall be best fitted to discharge the duties of the office. The situation is entirely different from that of our federal courts. There is no provision for retirement. There is a fixed tenure of seven years, and it is not changed by this bill. If any member of the commission be unable, for any cause, to properly perform the duties of his office, it will lie with the President and the Senate, at the end of his term, to secure a man who can do the work properly. The argument that is made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], that the powers of the commission should be extended, is the very reason why we should provide machinery for the commission to do the work they ask and properly do the very work now at hand. The machinery can be best extended by having able men sufficient in number, in character, and in caliber to perform the work. This bill does not change the tenure of office or the compensation or the political affiliations of the commission. It leaves it just exactly as it is now. It adds two new members to do the proper work that is demanded by the people should be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARDY and Mr. MADDEN) there were—ayes 141, noes 51.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. All in favor thereof will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-three gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. MACON. Give us the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. We just had the other side. The yeas and nays are refused, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules are suspended and the bill is passed.

INSPECTION OF NURSERY STOCK AT PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 27367) to provide for the inspection of nursery stock at ports of entry of the United States, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a quarantine against the importation and against the transportation in interstate commerce of diseased nursery stock or nursery stock infested with injurious insects, and making an appropriation to carry the same into effect, and to consider the same in the House at this time, which bill I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, shall be subject to inspection by official experts of the Department of Agriculture at such ports of entry as shall, from time to time, be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and published in the regulations provided for in this act: Provided, however, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, at his discretion, dispense with such inspection if he deems the certificate, provided for in section 2, of the official expert of the country from which the importation is made to be a sufficient guaranty of freedom from injurious insects or plant diseases. The Secretary of Agriculture may, at any time, extend the provisions of this act to fruits and vegetables or bulbs or other plants not specified in this act and imported from foreign countries whenever he shall deem such action necessary to prevent the entry with such products or stock of dangerous insects or plant diseases.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any transportation company, person, or persons, after July 1, 1909, to offer for entry at any port in the United States any nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, unless accompanied by a certificate of inspection by an official expert of the country from which the importation is made, which certificate shall be made in the manner and form prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, certifying that the contents have been examined and found to be apparently free from all dangerously injurious insect pests or plant diseases: Provided, That any nursery stock or other described articles offered for entry without such certificate shall be held in quarantine, and not admitted until its or their freedom from dangerous insect pests or plant diseases shall have been fully established.

SEC. 3. That any transportation company, person, or persons who shall receive, bring, or cause to be brought into the United States any nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, shall, within twenty-four hours after the arrival thereof, notify the official expert of their arrival, and hold the same, without unnecessarily moving or placing such articles where they may be harmful, for the immediate inspection of such official expert. The official expert or his representative is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into any warehouse, depot, or upon any dock, wharf, or any other place where such nursery stock or other described articles are received for the purpose of making the inspection or examination herein provided for.

SEC. 4. That each case, box, package, crate, bale, or bundle of nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, imported or brought into the United States shall have plainly and legibly marked thereon the name and address of the shipper, owner, or person forwarding or shipping the same, and also the name of the person, firm, or corporation to whom the same is forwarded or shipped, or his or its responsible agent; also the name of the country and district where the contents were grown.

SEC. 5. That when any shipment of nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, imported or brought into the United States is found infested with injurious insects or their eggs, larvæ, or pupæ, or reason to presume that they may be infested or are so infested with tree, plant, or fruit disease or diseases, the entire shipment shall be disinfected at the expense of the owner, owners, or agent. After such disinfection it shall be detained in quarantine a necessary time to determine the result of such disinfection. If the disinfection has been so performed as to destroy all insects or their eggs, and so as to eradicate all disease and prevent contagion, and in a manner satisfactory to the official expert, the trees, vines, or other articles shall then be released. If it be not practicable to fully disinfect such stock, it or such portion of it as shall remain infested shall be denied entry or destroyed, at the option of the owner.

SEC. 6. That when any shipment of nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, imported or brought into the United States is infested with injurious insects or their eggs, larvæ, or pupæ, or any tree, plant, or fruit disease not known to exist in the United States or confined to limited districts thereof, such infested shipment shall be refused entry and returned to the consignor or destroyed, at the option of the owner, owners, or agent and at his or their expense.

SEC. 7. That whenever it shall appear to the Secretary of Agriculture that any nursery stock or other described articles or variety of fruit grown in an infested district outside of the United States is being, or is about to be, imported into the United States or the District of Columbia, and such nursery stock or such variety of fruit is infested by any seriously injurious insect or disease, and which insect or disease is liable to become established in the United States, he shall have authority to quarantine against any importations from said district and prevent the same until such time as it may appear to him that any such insect or disease has become exterminated in the country or district from which such nursery stock, etc., or variety of fruit is being or is about to be, imported, when he may withdraw the quarantine; and this shall operate to relieve all such nursery stock or fruit from further quarantine or restrictions, save the inspection regulations at port of entry, so long as the conditions of freedom from seriously injurious insect or disease shall continue.

SEC. 8. That upon complaint or reasonable ground on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to believe that any nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, grown within the United States, are infested with injurious insects or diseases new to the United States and likely to become subjects of interstate commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause the same to be inspected by a qualified expert, and, if need be, placed under quarantine until such infestation is removed. This inspection shall be made, so far as possible, prior to November 1 of each year in the manner provided for and prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture; and if such nursery stock is found to be apparently free from dangerously injurious insects or diseases the certificate of the officer making such examination and finding shall be issued to the owner or owners of such nursery stock, a copy of which certificate shall be attached to and accompany each carload, box, bale, or package, and when so attached and accompanying shall operate to release all such nursery stock from further inspection, quarantine, or restriction in interstate commerce.

SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation, or to the postal service of the United States (except for scientific purposes, and by permission of the Secretary of Agriculture), for transportation from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or for exportation to any foreign country, any trees, plants, shrubs, vines, or other nursery stock which are under quarantine in accordance with the provisions of section 8 of this act, or which on such examination have been declared by the inspector to be infested with dangerously injurious insects or diseases. Any person, persons, firm, or corporation who shall forge, counterfeit, or knowingly alter, deface, or destroy any certificate or copy thereof, as provided for in this act and in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or shall in any way violate the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on a conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $500 nor less than $200 or by imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 10. That the rules and regulations herein provided for shall be promulgated on or before the 1st day of July of each year.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $100,000, to be available on the 1st day of May, 1909, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect on and after the 30th day of June, 1909.

SEC. 13. That the provisions of this act shall not prevent the inspection of any nursery stock or other described articles by the authorized inspector of any State or Territory at the final point of destination in accordance with the laws of such State or Territory.

With the following amendment:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill creates any new officers or new salaries; and if so, what is the necessity for it?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, if the amendment which is recommended by the Committee on Agriculture prevails, the bill carries an appropriation of $25,000, to be available during the coming fiscal year, to carry it into effect; and necessarily, if that $25,000 is used, it will mean the employment of certain persons who are perhaps not now in the employ of the Government.

The necessity for it is found in the fact that we now have no law to provide for the inspection of nursery stock coming from abroad, or to exclude it from admission if it is found to be either infected by disease or infested by injurious insects. The immediate cause of the introduction of this bill is found in the fact that very recently in the shipment of nursery stock coming into the port of New York upward of fifteen hundred nests of the brown-tailed moth were found. That is an insect which is committing very serious depredation, as the gentleman doubtless knows, throughout New England, and yet we have no law on the statute books by which we can exclude a shipment of goods in which it is carried.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman state how those moths were found? Is not there some machinery now for doing that?

Mr. SCOTT. They were found by inspectors of the department of horticulture of the State of New York.

Mr. HARRISON. State officials?

Mr. SCOTT. State officials. And it is true, as the gentleman suggests, that several of the state officials in States having ports of entry have organized state boards for the inspection of these goods in an attempt to exclude them from the country. But this work is not always effective, as is shown by the fact that of the 73 varieties of injurious insects which the entomologists of our country put into the first class, more than half of them are known to have been imported from abroad.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman state that in his opinion the employment of this new appropriation will stop the importation and the spread of noxious insects for the extermination of which we are annually appropriating large sums of money? In other words, will it effect an economy in the long run?

Mr. SCOTT. I am very much of the opinion it will do so. We are proposing to expend only $25,000 for the exclusion of these insects, but we are appropriating $300,000 this year alone to limit the ravages of just one insect which has been imported.

Mr. BURLESON. As a matter of fact, then, the bill has in contemplation the appointment of a scientific horticulturist and a scientific entomologist at every port of entry where nursery stock is brought in.

Mr. SCOTT. The bill is intended to do with nursery stock that which has already been attempted in the protection of domestic animals in this country.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, you can not enforce it unless you have a scientific horticulturist and a scientific entomologist at each port of entry.

Mr. SCOTT. Undoubtedly it contemplates, and in fact by its terms, an inspection of all nursery stock seeking to come into this country, but it provides also that nursery stock that comes with proper certificates from recognized authorities abroad may be admitted without inspection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. If the Secretary of Agriculture recommended $100,000 for the administration of this law, why is it that the committee cut it down to $25,000?

Mr. SCOTT. The committee cut it down to $25,000 because it was a new departure, and the committee believed that the work could be done for $25,000. It is thought a beginning could be made with that amount.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I presume the committee thinks after they once get this law started and made a part of the business of the Department of Agriculture it will be easy to increase it from year to year?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, the committee thought even if it did cost $100,000 a year to keep these insects out it will be an economy, in view of the fact that the insects which have come in in the absence of this law are now actually causing millions of dollars' worth of loss to our country, and we are expending many hundreds of thousands of dollars in an attempt to exterminate them or limit their ravages.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Has the committee any information whatever what it would cost, or simply put on $25,000 and seek to get the law enacted and later on get more money? Have they any information as to what it would cost?

Mr. SCOTT. Until the law has been enforced a reasonable length of time it is impossible for us to tell what it will cost.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair the gentleman had better make the motion. Is there objection?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to get some information.

The SPEAKER. Well, what is in the mind of the Chair is the gentleman asked unanimous consent and——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, if objection is to be made, in order to save time I will move that the rules be suspended and the bill as amended be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further discussion of the bill, and agree to the amendments and pass the bill. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I object to the bill, but it is a bill that may affect very largely the interests of our country, and I would at least like to understand what it is, and I would demand a second for the purpose of having an explanation of it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Kansas is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York to twenty minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to use any of my time except to answer such questions as may be asked.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to ask the gentleman from Kansas with reference to the bill, because I do not quite understand the connection between the statement made by the gentleman and the form of the bill. As I understand it, it is desired to keep from importation into this country by proper examination insects that may be dangerous.

To that there can be no objection; but the bill also provides not merely for an examination of goods coming from other countries—and to what extent it provides I wish the gentleman would state—but for an examination of any nursery goods sent from any one of the 46 States into any other one of the 46 States. Now, if that is so, that provides that every package of nursery stock that goes from New York to Pennsylvania may be examined and inspected, which is a pretty serious proposition.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think I can answer the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. I am asking for information. I have not read the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Each State has provided an inspection law for nursery stock. The inspection is made by the state entomologist some time during the summer, and he gives a certificate, a copy of which certificate must accompany each shipment of stock. Now, I apprehend if this bill passes, this Government will adopt the same plan—that any inspection that is to be made must be made before shipment between the States. But any inspection to be made will be made before the shipment takes place.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] is fully answered by the terms of section 8, as follows:

That upon complaint or reasonable ground on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to believe that any nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, grown within the United States are infested with injurious insects or diseases new to the United States and likely to become subjects of interstate commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause the same to be inspected by a qualified expert, and, if need be, placed under quarantine until such infection is removed.

It would appear from this that no broad general inspection of every interstate shipment of nursery stock is contemplated, such as the gentleman suggests, but merely that when complaint is made that any particular district of the United States is infested with injurious insects an inspection may be made, and if it is found that the injurious insects exist there the district may be quarantined, just as a portion of the United States may now be quarantined when it is infected with diseases injurious to domestic animals.

Mr. MANN. Like the foot-and-mouth disease now.

Mr. PERKINS. What I would like to ask is this, in order to find out whether or not the bill is too drastic: Suppose tomorrow a dealer in nursery stock in western New York has an order for the delivery of goods to California; in compliance with the order he packs his goods, he takes them to the railroad, and they are shipped to California; has he got to have any examination or have any certificate, or be subject to any formality any more than if he was shipping a lot of cotton goods?

Mr. SCOTT. Not unless his nursery is in a district against which complaint has been made. If that is the case, then the Department of Agriculture, under this bill, is authorized to send an expert to inspect the district and to inspect his nursery. If his particular nursery is found to be apparently free from dangerous and injurious insects or diseases—I am quoting now from the bill:

And if such nursery stock is found to be apparently free from dangerously injurious insects or diseases the certificate of the officer making such examination and finding shall be issued to the owner or owners of such nursery stock, a copy of which certificate shall be attached to and accompany each carload, box, bale, or package, and when so attached and accompanying shall operate to release all such nursery stock from further inspection, quarantine, or restriction in interstate commerce.

Mr. PERKINS. Then the law provides for quarantine of a certain district?

Mr. SCOTT. The law provides for a quarantine of the district which, upon inspection, may be found to be infected or infested.

Mr. PERKINS. Then you can not ship out of that district without certificate that your stock is all right and that the quarantine has been raised as to you?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the intention of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. If no quarantine has been declared, he ships his nursery goods just as he ships his dry goods?

Mr. SCOTT. Just as a man, when no quarantine has been declared, ships his cattle.

Mr. MANN. Ship just as freely as he does now.

Mr. PERKINS. The bill provides that all nursery stock shipped from a port must be examined or a certificate made on the other side?

Mr. LAMB. This is chiefly to reach imported stock?

Mr. BURLESON. What powers are conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture to designate ports of entry for nursery stock?

Mr. SCOTT. There is not any power in this bill to designate any particular port of entry. I refer to section 2, which declares:

That it shall be unlawful for any transportation company, person, or persons, after July 1, 1909, to offer for entry at any port in the United States any nursery stock, including field-grown florists' stock, trees, shrubs, plants, vines, cuttings, grafts, scions, buds, fruit pits, or other seeds, unless accompanied by a certificate of inspection by an official expert of the country from which the importation is made, which certificate shall be made in the manner and form prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, certifying that the contents have been examined and found to be apparently free from all dangerously injurious insect pests or plant diseases: Provided, That any nursery stock or other described articles offered for entry without such certificate shall be held in quarantine, and not admitted until its or their freedom from dangerous insect pests or plant diseases shall have been fully established.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. A large part of the nursery stock that is imported into this country is seedling stock, and a very large part of it comes from France. Now, it is nothing uncommon to have 20,000 of those packed in a box, and they are packed loosely; that is, they are not tied in bunches. Now, is it practicable to undertake to inspect nursery stock packed that way? You would have to open the box, surely.

Mr. MANN. It does not require inspection when it comes with a certificate.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think not. But it looks to me like the inspection at the port of entry would be impracticable.

Mr. MANN. It would, unless they had some other information.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. As a matter of fact, I think it has to be governed largely by the certificate that accompanies the stock. It is like the state laws, where they have to have a certificate by the state entomologist after an examination of the stock as it leaves the nursery.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not think it would be any more difficult to enforce than the present law against the importation of adulterated or misbranded foods and drugs.

Mr. BURLESON. Would it be as expensive?

Mr. SCOTT. I have no idea it would be as expensive.

Mr. MANN. Upon the face of it, it would not.

Mr. SCOTT. The Secretary of Agriculture would doubtless prescribe as a regulation that the nursery stock coming in from abroad must have a certificate of good health.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is the only way.

Mr. BURLESON. Why I ask that question is that Texas is now importing orange plants from Japan. Do I understand under the operation of this law every box of orange plants that should be shipped from Japan to Texas must be opened at San Francisco?

Mr. SCOTT. I understand there is an inspection under the direction of the state board of horticulture of that State.

Mr. BURLESON. Where there is a through bill of lading?

Mr. SCOTT. Well, I can not answer as to that.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think it is to be applied to stock to be used in the State. The gentleman's State would have to be very cautious about what stock it imported.

Mr. BURLESON. We do not want anything in the way of an obstruction to our getting the stock, nor anything to delay us.

Mr. SMITH of California. I think you would find it a good deal better to exclude injurious insects that you might get, and any little delay that might be suffered would be better than to have the pest.

Mr. SCOTT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I only want to emphasize what the chairman of the committee has been saying, namely, that the gentleman from Texas wants to be very careful about doing anything that would allow the shipping in of diseased nursery stock in establishing an orange business. It is the most valuable nursery stock, and leads to exceedingly high-priced orchards when you get an orange grove. A few years ago there was introduced into the orchards of California the white fly. If it had not been attacked and stamped out, and that at very considerable expense, right at its incipiency, the damage would have run into the millions of dollars to the citrus orchards of California, and at a cost for extermination of many hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I think, as the chairman of the committee has said, we have a pretty severe law in California with reference to nursery stock, but I think we should also have some such general law as this to guard the character of stock that is brought in from foreign countries, as well as that which goes from State to State. There is no bill before this Congress, I think, that will give greater pleasure to the orchardists of California than this measure now before the House, and I earnestly hope that the House will give it careful consideration.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. SMITH of California. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Has the gentleman read this bill with sufficient care to be able to state that no provision in it will interfere with the introduction of those plants that I have spoken of?

Mr. SMITH of California. I have not studied all the provisions of the bill in detail, but I am certain that the Agricultural Department in its management of the matter under this bill will interpose no obstruction to bringing in proper nursery stock; and you do not want any other kind in Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of California. I have no doubt the law will be administered wisely.

Mr. SCOTT. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker and fellow-Members, the State of Virginia is very much interested in this legislation. I had a letter from the state entomologist recently stating that some gypsy moths had been imported from a foreign State. The Committee on Agriculture has very carefully considered this measure and recommend the passage of the bill. It is in the interest of the people, and it will prevent, probably, in the future spending an immense amount of money in other States as we are now spending in the New England States in eradicating this pest. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to pass this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill as amended was passed.

RADIO-TELEGRAPHY ON CERTAIN OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 27672) as amended, to require radio-telegraphic installations and radio-telegraphers on certain ocean steamers, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. COCKRAN. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That it shall be unlawful for any ocean-going steamer certified to carry, or carrying, 50 passengers or more, to engage in the business of carrying passengers, or to carry passengers, between ports 200 miles or more apart by sea, unless on leaving her port of departure such steamer shall be equipped with an efficient radio-telegraphic apparatus in good working order, and in charge of a person skilled in the use of such radio-telegraphic apparatus.

"SEC. 2. Any owner, agent, or master of any such steamer described in section 1 of this act, who shall carry, or permit to be carried, any passenger upon any such steamer not equipped with an efficient radio-telegraphic apparatus, in good working order, and in charge of a person skilled in the use of such radio-telegraphic apparatus, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $3,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

"SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force one year after the date of its approval."

Mr. COCKRAN. I withdraw the demand for a second.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I demand a second.

Mr. GREENE. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, there have been many hearings held before the committee regarding this bill, and there was no opposition before the committee to the bill as now presented. I do not care to occupy more time at this moment, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, with the general ideas of this legislation I am in accord, but there are one or two points that I think ought to defeat its passage.

In the first place, there is no provision that will permit these vessels to escape compliance with the law, even if there should be a combination between these wireless companies to raise the price to any point, however unreasonable. As gentlemen of the House know, this wireless system is a patented system, and this bill compels all seagoing vessels running between ports 200 miles or more apart to equip themselves within a year with a wireless system. They are compelled to comply with that provision, and there is no way for them to escape it. I do not believe that is wise legislation. I think some provision should be made so that if it was discovered that there was a monopoly existing between these wireless companies, and there was an attempt to hold up these vessels and charge them exorbitant prices, they should not be compelled to equip within a year. Some latitude should be given.

Mr. GOULDEN. Can the gentleman tell me how many of these companies there are?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I can not.

Mr. GOULDEN. How many companies are there that now equip vessels?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There are quite a number, but only two or three of them are actually doing much work.

Mr. GOULDEN. I have a list here of 76.

Mr. BURLESON. Does this require equipment with any particular system?

Mr. GOULDEN. No. And I have a list here of 76 separate companies.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There is one other objection that I want to call to the attention of the House, and that is the inequality of this bill. It shows that it is hasty legislation, and that it should not have been reported in the shape in which it is. For instance, the committee in their report set forth the fact that the Great Lakes are excluded, and I think that was a wise conclusion. I think the Great Lakes should be excluded.

Mr. SULZER. Why should the Great Lakes be excluded?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Wait until I get through my statement, and I will answer the question. At the same time they include vessels running along the coast of Florida inside of the keys, where the water is always quiet and there is no occasion for wireless telegraphy, because they are never out of sight of land. They also include the vessels that run on the inside passage to Alaska, where they are always near the shore, where the water is never rough, where they never have any storms that will interfere with them, and if a vessel did not sink in a few minutes they could get ashore. Yet they exclude the Great Lakes, where the vessels do encounter great storms, and where there would be some use for the wireless system. As I have said, I am in sympathy with this legislation, but not in sympathy with this bill, the way it is drawn. It is not the right kind of legislation, in my judgment, for us to enact.

Mr. SULZER. Then you are in favor of including the Great Lakes?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I am not. Neither am I in favor of including these other vessels along the Florida coast and on the inside passage to Alaska. You might as well include vessels on the Mississippi River as vessels that run on the inside passage to Alaska, as my friend knows. I am simply calling attention to the defects of the bill. I do not think in the shape it is it ought to pass.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman base his sole objection to the passage of the bill upon the ground that he is afraid that the owners of these wireless-telegraph instruments will combine for the purpose of raising the price, or does the gentleman in addition to that have some other objection; and if so, what?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have just tried to state that one objection is because there is nothing to prevent combination of the wireless companies, and the other is that it compels vessels on several different routes to be equipped with wireless telegraphy where there is no need for it.

Mr. COCKRAN. What is the alternative to adopting this bill? Would it leave these ocean-going vessels carrying passengers without any wireless system at all being required of them?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If this is not adopted, as I understand, there is no law now to compel them to use it.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman is opposed to this because the measure is defective in some particulars. Would he be willing to defeat all legislation of this character and leave the ocean-going public without the safeguards provided by this measure because the bill is not perfect?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I would perfect the bill. I would have a bill reported that covers the situation and pass it.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman does not think that there is any chance of doing that, does he?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know why.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is a why and a wherefore.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not understand why we can not pass a bill correctly drawn, as well as one that does not contain what the House desires.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is true that there are ships that ply along the Alaskan coast and the Florida coast and do not go outside.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; there are several such vessels. Mr. Speaker, I now reserve the balance of my time, and I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman in favor of the bill is entitled to explain it, I think.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, while I am to some extent responsible rather for the form of this bill than for its general policy, I have no doubt whatever in my own mind that the time has come in the development of radio or wireless telegraphy when Congress should require such vessels as are described in this bill to be equipped for its use. The whole coast of the Atlantic and the Gulf, as well as our Pacific coast, is now equipped with radio-telegraphic stations, which makes it possible for ships during the whole of any coastwise trip to communicate with the shore if they are equipped with this radio-telegraphic apparatus.

So I believe that the time has come when the Congress of the United States should require, as this bill does, vessels certified for carrying 50 passengers or more and running 200 miles (which, by the way, would exclude vessels in the inner key routes of Florida spoken of by the gentleman from Washington) to be equipped with this apparatus.

It will be seen that the bill is purely a penal bill; that its first section substantially defines the duty of equipping the vessels with this telegraphic apparatus and rendering it unlawful if they do not, while the second section defines the penalty. The penalty, it will be observed, is not more than $3,000 and not more than one year, leaving the minimum amount of fine or imprisonment entirely at the discretion of the judge.

But there is one thing more I do want to call attention to in the time allotted me, and that is that the committee left out section 3 of the old bill, which gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the right to remit or mitigate the penalty. I hope that that provision will not be carried any longer in any bills relating to navigation. I believe it is an absolutely vicious provision, and the penalty ought to be so arranged as to do without it. With the general provisions of this bill I am in hearty accord.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] three minutes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think no one questions for a moment the necessity for some legislation of this character. Our committee had many hearings and numerous sessions, and this bill, after careful deliberation, is the result. The objection that my friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] makes simply applies to some few vessels plying along the Pacific coast north of Seattle.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULDEN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWSON. Would the terms of this bill, "if vessels engaged in intercontinental traffic," go to the greyhounds of the ocean that travel between the United States and foreign countries?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; certainly. Out of the foreign vessels, 110 of them, about one-half, are now equipped with proper apparatus and are able to communicate. There are a great many foreign vessels, however, bringing steerage passengers here that have no equipment of that character. They should be compelled to do so to protect human lives aboard. Among American vessels we find 127 equipped with this apparatus, 4 being on the Great Lakes. The reason that the latter are not included in this bill is because there are no stations, or very few, on the shores of the Great Lakes, so that a system of this character would be almost useless. At any rate, the committee thought it not so necessary there as on the ocean.

There is no doubt but that it is necessary to compel vessel owners who are guilty of indifference or negligence in this matter to equip their vessels with the necessary radio-telegraphic instruments and a competent operator. There are first-class seagoing vessels and coastwise steamers that are now properly equipped, but there are a number of others that have been neglected, either through carelessness or indifference. The case with the General Slocum, in New York Harbor, where the equipment in other ways was bad and inadequate, was simply that the law was not sufficient or well enough administered to compel them to use the required equipment for the safety of its passengers. As a result, more than 1,000 lives were lost on that terrible June day, 1904. In this connection, I find that the question of monopoly or combine was thoroughly thrashed out by the committee.

Mr. Wilson, of New York, the president of the United Wireless Telegraph Company, a well-established and efficient institution, at the hearings said:

> There are the Massie people, the International Company, the so-called "Slaby-Arco," and the Stone people. I do not know but there are more than that. Here is a list of them: Marconi, the United Wireless, the Fessenden, the Massie, and the Colliers.

All efficient and ready for use.

He further stated that there was no combination, either actual or contemplated, among these companies.

On this subject I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my brief remarks the message of the President, and to express the hope that the pending bill (H. R. 27672) will pass, as it is in the interest of human life.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your attention is invited to recent events which have conclusively demonstrated the great value of radio-telegraphy, popularly known as "wireless" telegraphy, as an instrumentality for the preservation of life at sea.

While the honor of the first practical application of the scientific principles involved may belong to another country, it is gratifying to know that our inventors have been quick to seize upon and develop the idea, and that several systems of approved scientific merit and commercial practicability have been put into operation in the United States.

Furthermore, through the liberality of Congress and the intelligence and industry of the Navy Department, our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts are equipped with a chain of shore stations, designed primarily for the national defense, but capable of receiving and transmitting messages by any of the systems of wireless telegraphy now in general use. Even our distant insular territories and Alaska are so equipped.

So far as our own country is concerned, steps have thus been taken effectually to prevent the establishment of a monopoly in the practical use of the new applied art.

I deem it highly desirable that the Congress, before adjournment, should enact a law requiring within reasonable limitations, as determined by what the Government of the United States has already done, and by what prudent and progressive shipowners have already found practicable, that all ocean-going steamships, carrying considerable numbers of passengers on routes where wireless installations would be useful, should be required to carry efficient radio-telegraphic installations and competent operators. The subject is now under consideration by the Congress, and I am advised that legislation to effect the same general purpose is also under consideration abroad.

Our interest in its enactment is keen on account of the great number of steerage as well as cabin passengers who annually arrive at and depart from our ports. What we have already done along practical lines warrants the United States in being first among nations to enact a statute requiring the use of this safeguard of human life.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1909.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fourteen minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, sympathetic legislation is often dangerous. Everybody sympathizes with the desire to save human life, and if the various steamship companies are not now in the main equipped with wireless telegraph apparatus, it might be proper to pass this bill. But the large steamers are already equipped with wireless telegraphy. Now, here is a proposition to require every steamer which carriers 50 passengers, whether it be a freight steamer or a passenger steamer, to equip itself with wireless telegraph apparatus.

There are only two or three companies that can be utilized. It is the easiest thing in the world to make a combination. There is absolutely no restriction as to the cost to which vessels shall be put and no restriction as to the cost of messages when they are to be transmitted. It seems to me that when we pass a bill covering this subject we ought to cover the wireless telegraph subject. We ought to provide in reference to the use of the wireless telegraph on shore which now prevents the catching up of half the messages that are sent. We ought to limit the cost which these companies can charge a freight steamer or a passenger steamer, and then we ought to limit the cost which they can charge to a passenger when transmitting for him a message. Here we require certain things to be done, a patented device to be used, with no limitation on the power to combine and to make a charge. It seems to me preposterous.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the gentleman think that without regard to whether a vessel is called a passenger or a freight steamer, if it is certified to carry 50 passengers and does carry them, as this bill says, it ought to be equipped without regard to whether it is nominally freight or passenger?

Mr. MANN. I think that every vessel that sails the sea ought in some way to be equipped with some wireless instrument. I do not think that this bill accomplishes it in the proper way, nor do I think the bill is sufficiently considered. I have no criticism of the committee. The matter is a new proposition, and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries promptly and properly considered the bill and reported it in. The committee of which I happen to be a member is still giving consideration to other bills on the subject. We had not thought we had learned enough of it to report in the bill. It seems to me that when we cover the cost we ought to make provision for these things. For instance, on a passenger steamer they now maintain the wireless telegraph for $1,000 a year after installation and furnish the operator. On a freight steamer they require the steamship to furnish the operator and still charge a considerable sum, so that it costs a freight steamer now more to maintain the wireless telegraph for 50 passengers than it does the great big steamships with a thousand or more passengers. They can raise the rate just as high as they please, because when we provide that the steamship shall be fined if it does not make the installation, then they can put up a combination. Will they do it? Do the gentlemen know of any concerns in the country with power to combine that do not combine? Do the gentlemen know any two or three concerns in the country where Congress requires their instruments to be used who do not put up the price unless they are restrained from doing so by a limitation put upon the cost? There is no limitation here at all upon the cost, absolutely none, nor is there any limitation upon the cost of sending messages, and we all know that while these wireless companies are now asking for the passage of this bill the moment it is a law they will resist any desire or effort to regulate their charges.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. While we are requiring the use of their instruments, we ought to limit the amount of their charges. Why should we require a man wanting to send a message to pay the rate which these people choose to ask? To-day they furnish the messages to the ships free—that is, messages for the use of the ships—but does anyone think that the messages to the ships will be furnished free when the law puts a penalty on the ship if it does not have an instrument? This bill will put the shipping industry of the country absolutely at the mercy of two or three gentlemen, who may be very public-spirited, who may be exceedingly philanthropic and humane, but who will undoubtedly use every opportunity to make money for themselves. The bill ought to be recommitted to the committee; it ought to come back from it now, or at a future session of Congress, covering these points, restricting the amount that can be charged for the installation of the machinery, restricting the amount that can be charged for the maintenance and operation of it, and restricting and limiting the amount that may be charged for the use of it or for messages sent by passengers on the steamships.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, even without this bill a large number of ocean-going steamers would finally be equipped with wireless telegraph. The competition among the greyhounds of the ocean is such that the great traveling public that pays good transportation rates would not travel on any other kind of a vessel, but there are a great many vessels that are not of this high class and character carrying steerage passengers for very low transportation rates that are not equipped and would not be equipped with these instruments, and it is necessary to compel them by law to be so supplied.

Now, as to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois: The very thing that he says is not done by this bill is not done by the railroad rate bill, the appliance law we passed yesterday providing that certain kinds of appliances shall be used, and other laws that have been passed relating to the railroads of this country, and there is no place——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HINSHAW. And there is no place that we compel these companies to furnish railroad appliances of various kinds at any given price. I believe there would be objection to any form of bill that undertakes to force upon these vessels this kind of wireless telegraph, but if injustice occurs, if exorbitant charges are made and combinations appear within the next year, the Congress is fully able to take care of that matter when that situation arises. There are seven or eight different companies which engage in this business, and they are competitors. If by any chance they should combine and force up prices unduly, the Congress can meet the situation when it comes. I think it is a meritorious measure. We could not avoid all pitfalls and all troubles and objection that have been suggested. We could only suggest here a bill that will carry relief to most of the situations that occur in seagoing traffic.

Mr. GILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HINSHAW. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill covers the radio-telephone?

Mr. HINSHAW. No; it does not, for the reason——

Mr. GILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if that should not also be taken in?

Mr. HINSHAW. I was one of those in favor of including the radio-telephone, but the evidence before the committee was almost overwhelming to the effect that the radio-telephone had not progressed sufficiently to make it proper or expedient to be included in this bill or to make it a vital proposition at the present time. When that system is perfected, as no doubt it will be, it can easily be taken care of by legislation. The radio-telegraph is in a present stage of efficiency so that it can be installed on all ocean-going vessels. General Uhler, Supervising Inspector-General of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, who appeared before the committee, advocated the putting of this upon every vessel—freight, passenger, steam, or sail vessels—whether they carried passengers or simply——

Mr. COCKRAN. Why did not they?

Mr. HINSHAW. Simply because at this stage of the proceeding it is almost impossible to reach a situation of that kind and compel every vessel, of small or large capacity, to put on this expensive service. It is almost impossible to compel every vessel now carrying no passengers to put up an installation that will cost a thousand dollars and initiate a service that will cost a thousand dollars a year to maintain.

The Members of the House, and the country, will understand that this is a new service, and that it was impossible for the committee preparing this bill to meet every possible case that will arise. No doubt further legislation will be necessary as the various systems of radio-communication are perfected. The startling disaster of the collision of the Republic and Florida has aroused not only this country, but other countries as well, to the necessity of having some efficient form of radio-communication on most vessels carrying passengers and eventually upon all.

This bill provides that a vessel carrying 50 or more passengers shall be provided with an efficient radio-telegraph. In navy and army circles the wireless telephone is now used to some extent with success, but the opinion of the naval officers indicates that the installation of this service on the fleet just now returning from around the world has not been such a success as to warrant us in compelling vessels to maintain it. When perfected the telephone will doubtless supersede the telegraph. It does not require an expert to operate; it is simpler and probably cheaper.

The Government of the United States has already established wireless stations along our seacoast. These stations receive messages from any and all of the various systems now in use. So far as your committee could ascertain, the seven or eight wireless systems now operating in this country are in competition for commercial business. If any combination shall hereafter be made by these various companies to raise prices of apparatus or charges for service, legislation can easily be enacted to protect the public, and it is probable that new systems would be so rapidly developed, because of the widespread use this marvelous system of communication is destined to enjoy, that prices of installation and maintenance are more likely to decrease than to rise.

There are at present in the United States, either partially or wholly equipped for services, five systems, to wit: The Fessenden, the United Wireless, the Massie, the Stone, and the Clark systems. In Germany the Telefunken system prevails. The Japanese vessels are equipped with the Teishinsho system. Denmark has the Poulsen. France the Branlypopp and the Rochfort. In England is the Lodge-Muirhead. In addition to these the United States Signal Corps has a system of its own, and there are various systems in embryo conducting experiments and perfecting appliances. Wireless telegraphy has already astonished the world, and yet we know it is but in its infancy. The possibilities of the development of wireless communication are limitless. The discoveries in new methods of communication and transportation are so marvelous that our imaginations can hardly conceive the changes that are destined in a few short years to take place, and which will affect the social, industrial, and political life of all the world.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as one of the most important pieces of legislation offered for enactment by the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. WALDO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would be very glad to, but I have only two minutes and I have not time to do so.

Mr. WALDO. I trust there will be some gentleman here who will yield to give us a little information on this subject——

Mr. COX of Indiana. There can scarcely be a bill presented upon the floor of the House but what there will be some objections urged against it. What are the objections waged against this bill this morning? For fear that the men who own the radio-telegraph instruments in the United States will unite and combine for the purpose of raising the price of these instruments. On one side that is an argument, placing the almighty dollar on one side of the ledger against the safety of human life on the other. I was one of the committee who firmly believed that this bill should provide that all steam vessels carrying passengers, or freight likewise, should be equipped with this kind of instrument, but, upon investigation, and particularly from that stalwart gentleman who represents the city of Cleveland, I came to the conclusion it was premature at this time to incorporate a provision of that kind into this bill. The argument is further made that this is an inopportune time to legislate, for the reason that it is not well considered. Aye, Mr. Speaker, the very gentleman who is now opposing this bill upon this ground, I can refer him to the great Iroquois Theater fire, which occurred a few years ago in the city of Chicago, where 600 lives were lost, largely, if not entirely, as a result of the dereliction of duty of the people in power in the city of Chicago. Had the city authorities in the city of Chicago looked to the hanging of the doors before that direful calamity, and seen that the doors were hung so as to swing outward, the chances are largely in favor of the proposition that the many hundreds of women and children who were burned up in that holocaust would have been saved an untimely and unfortunate death. Again, I recall, and no doubt every Member here does the same, last winter when the city of Cleveland was overwhelmed by grief in the loss of more than 100 school children, brought about largely because of the fact that the doors to said school again swung inward instead of outward. The happening of these two catastrophes called attention everywhere to the existence of conditions, and no doubt led to sound and healthy legislation along these lines to improve conditions in the safety of human life. Shall we wait until thousands of human lives are actually lost at sea because vessels carrying passengers are not equipped with a proper radio-telegraphic instrument?

All because for fear if we pass this bill the owners of these instruments may raise their price to the shipowners. I say no. Humanity says no. Now is the time for us to act, and act at once, without delay, to the end that we may do something for the countless millions of passengers who annually cross and recross the great oceans and land at the various ports of the United States. Should an attempt be made to increase the price of these instruments our worthy Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce can easily take charge of the situation when this condition arises, if it ever does arise. The use of these instruments on passenger steamers has been going on for some time, with no evidence of any combination upon their part to increase the cost of the instruments to the shipowners. So far as I am concerned, I do not care if it does increase the cost to the shipowners. When I am called upon to decide between the safety and preservation of human life, on the one hand, and the distant fear of increase of cost on the other, I unhesitatingly cast my lot on the side of humanity. I hope the bill will pass and that it may become a law, and when it does it will be a monument of glory to the Congress enacting it.

Mr. GREENE. I would like to have the gentleman from Washington yield some of his time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is all right, but I fully concur with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that hasty legislation of this character is apt to be ill-advised, and it seems to me that in one or two regards this bill is such. In the first place, I do not believe that the language limiting the appliances for communicating between vessels is well chosen. I do not know exactly what "radio-telegraphic apparatus" means; but in this age, when we are talking from one continent to another under the ocean, when crafts are sailing through the air, and when no man dare predict what may be or may not be in the near future, we certainly should not in a bill of this character limit and prescribe that ships should use any particular method of communication.

The telegraph is a wonderful thing. It may be better six months from now than anything known. So the committee in prescribing a particular appliance for communication has certainly closed the door against anything better that might be discovered in the near future. I am a believer in the doctrine that that government governs best which governs least, and I believe that all the ships carrying passengers will be compelled by the very circumstances that surround them to adopt some method of communication without compulsion and without criminal process.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STURGISS].

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Speaker, the last quarter of the nineteenth century and the opening years of the twentieth century have demonstrated beyond all the other years of history the supremacy of mind over matter. The mighty and often most terrible forces of nature have been subdued and not only stripped of their power for evil, but subjugated and harnessed, and have become benign instruments for helping to make life easy, attractive, and safe.

The most striking and recent illustration of this assertion was witnessed when two great ocean-going steamers, loaded with hundreds of people, the one nearing the conclusion of a 3,000-mile voyage, the other just leaving New York Harbor with a thousand pleasure-seeking passengers for a season's travel in the Mediterranean and the Orient, each all unconscious of the proximity of the other, till with a mighty crash in the darkness they were hurled against each other, dealing a deathblow to one vessel and inflicting great damage to the other, killing some passengers, and putting the lives of all in great peril. But mind, dominant over sea and darkness and distance, called aloud for help with the still, small voice of the radio-telegraph and told the tale of disaster and impending death and brought helping hands and words of cheer from scores of listening watchers.

One has truthfully said "the undevout astronomer is mad," who, having contemplated the stupendous magnitude of the solar systems that light our midnight skies, the enormous numbers of revolving suns and satellites, and the perfect harmony that holds each in his orbit and place, can see no divine supernatural power and wisdom displayed in all this mighty creation.

But the power and wisdom and beneficence of that Being who holds the firmaments in the hollow of His hand are no less plainly shown in the adaptation of mind to matter in this workaday world as in the heavens above; and the scientist who thoughtfully studies the qualities and properties, often occult and mysterious, that are inherent in matter, and considers the powers of the mind of man to discover and reveal them and apply them to his everyday uses and can see no God in it all, is undevout and mad. There are 10,000 inventions and discoveries that have so long been used that we regard them as commonplace and no longer marvel at them that illustrate the truth just stated.

The magnetic needle, the steam engine, the ocean greyhound, the railway locomotive, the telegraph, the submarine cable, the telephone, the phonograph, electric lighting, heating, and power, the natural gases, noxious and highly explosive, piped into our homes, furnaces, and factories, to give light and heat and power, are but a few illustrations of the nine days' wonder grown commonplace and prosaic. But each is proof of the fact that the mind of man, when stimulated by cupidity, curiosity, benevolence, or necessity, finds every form of material things endowed with or possessing inherently the property, quality, or characteristic that man needs in his operations and which he would give to matter if he possessed the power.

He wanted the magnetic needle, and found the loadstone; he needed the transparent glass, and with opaque sand and alkali he made the crystal lens; he wanted mechanical power to do his work, and found it in the energy of expanding steam, and so built his engine and steamship and locomotive; he wanted the metals with all their differing qualities of ductility, malleability, hardness, and temper, and found them in the ores and stones; he needed fuel for light and heat, and found it in coal and oil and gas; he worshiped in fear the lightnings of heaven till he had measured this most terrible and apparently most refractory element, but when his brain had mastered it, he found it possessed of the most varied and valuable properties; it became his messenger, outstripping Mercury, the winged god of the ancients; on land and under sea instantaneously it responded to his thought and touch; from it he derived light for his home and shop and street, and electricity made night as bright as the noonday; he grew tired of steam as a motive power and harnessed the lightning to his car; and needing a heat more intense than any fuel could produce, found it in the electric arc. He found this element was all about him, harmless and unnoticed in equilibrium, like the air we breathe, but like the air, which disturbed in its equilibrium, becomes the mighty tornado, destroying life and property, only a thousandfold more terrible and quicker in its death-dealing and property-destroying power.

He devised the dynamo, like a great ventilating fan, gathering in the electric element, disturbing its equilibrium, and sending it out in mighty impulses over the wires to do his bidding. He found he must have a good conductor to transmit and control the electric current, and found in copper and aluminum just the quality or characteristic needed, but at the same time he found that absolute nonconductivity was just as essential in order to insulate his wires and handle this fearful genius with safety, and in glass, porcelain, and hard rubber he found or created from crude materials the most perfect nonconductor.

And so far as the mind has explored the realm of nature, man has found the former dominant over matter and natural forces, and the latter everywhere responsive with the properties and qualities and characteristics that he needs.

Can it be that all this is chance, a mere fortuitous combination of elements, but always, when properly understood and applied, working for the good of humanity? Rather does it prove beyond all reasonable doubt that an all-wise, all-powerful, and always beneficent God reigns not alone in the invisible and visible heavens, but on and in the earth and the elements thereof and in the heart and brain of man.

What heart was not touched and eye moistened and love to man and praise to God stimulated when the account of the rescue of over sixty score passengers and half as many of the crews of the ill-fated Republic and Florida was first read a few days ago? Out of the darkness of fog and night came the sudden and awful collision that gave the death wound to one vessel and for a season paralyzed the other, giving promise of a fearful harvest of death. But here came a miracle of human genius and the application of the property of electricity and of the air to transmit for hundreds of miles the call of distress to all the listening ears on ship and shore that might be equipped with the newest device and discovery by man that wires are not needed to transmit thought and words, but that God's ether, ever around us, is ever ready to respond to man's call to his fellow-man in distress and in defeat, and in joy and in triumph.

Marconi, the inventor and discoverer, joined with Binns, the practical operator, in bringing speedy aid by friendly hands out of the darkness, from ship and shore, and in receiving words of cheer and encouragement for those waiting in suspense and dread. If man's inhumanity to man has caused countless thousands to mourn, nevertheless in these modern and, let us hope, better days, man's love of humanity and his dominion over the forces of nature have brought life and hope and happiness, as well as peace and prosperity, to millions in every land and every field of human activity. But let not our jubilation and emotions evaporate in speech, but let us give practical expression to them by voting for this bill, which requires every ocean passenger steamer embraced in the description in the bill to be equipped with efficient apparatus and a skilled operator that shall enable each vessel to keep in actual communication with every other like vessel and with each shore from the time she leaves port till she reaches her destination, and so diminish the dangers and lighten the solitude of those who sail the ocean and encounter the perils of the great deep.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I yield a half minute to my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, the subject before the House is one of great interest to me, and I have introduced a bill which, in effect, is the same as the measure which we are considering to-day. Limited time for debate prevents my going into the reasons and prevents me from having the opportunity to answer some of the objections that have been made. In view of that fact, I do not care to go into the discussion, but I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD my remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STURGISS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six and one-half minutes remaining.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just a few words and yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] to close the debate. It has been said by different Members in opposition to the passage of this bill that we are forcing these companies to put the radio-telegraph system upon their vessels. I think we are doing right when we do so, and I desire to call attention to the facts concerning two steamers which arrived in Boston on the 9th instant, one of them having first-class passengers and being fully equipped with everything necessary to preserve human life, including a radio-telegraph system. The other steamer carried a very large number of steerage passengers, and had more than twice as many passengers as the steamer first referred to, and it had no equipment such as is required by the terms of this bill. There is no reason why steerage passengers should not be supplied with every possible accommodation, and certainly with every modern improvement for the preservation of human life. Everyone knows that steerage passengers are profitable to the steamship owners. They occupy but very little space, they eat but very little food, and they come in large numbers. Owners of passenger steamers can not be excused on account of the question of the expense required by this bill from making the necessary provision for the preservation of human life.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I shall say but a few words more. This bill strikingly illustrates what the gentleman from Illinois has said—that it is dangerous to legislate out of sympathy. And I think enough has been shown to the House that they agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that this bill should go back to the committee and a proper bill reported. We reported this bill which provides that every steam vessel within a year shall be equipped with wireless apparatus. We do not limit the companies as to what they shall charge for the equipment; we do not limit them to what they shall charge the public for sending messages. The only answer to the gentlemen who are in favor of this bill have made to these statements is that we can correct it by legislation hereafter. Now, it seems to me that when we are granting this power, when we are compelling vessels to equip themselves with wireless apparatus, is the time to make these restrictions. As the gentleman from Illinois has well said, pass this legislation, and the very moment we attempt to restrict them in any way these companies will be here opposing it. We have no assurance that the present prices will continue.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that this legislation is on all fours with the legislation for this city and a great many others, requiring fire escapes to be placed on hotels?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not think so.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can not you pass legislation of this kind in that way?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not the same as a law compelling equipment with fire escapes. This allows the companies owning these vessels to be charged by the wireless companies so much by the year, and there is no limit as to the charge the vessels may have to pay.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are a great many patents on fire escapes and railroad appliances, and it is made the duty of railroads, under the law, to select the best appliances. Why should not the railroads select the best appliances?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. A fire escape is not a patented arrangement and not under the control of two or three companies.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. Is it not true that instead of the arrangement that the wireless company, at its expense, furnish the operator to passenger steamers that this bill transfers that burden to the ship, without any relief?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. So far as this bill is concerned, the company furnishing the apparatus can do as they please. The only restriction is to compel every vessel to equip itself with this apparatus within a year.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia. And also provide its own operator, which now the ship is not required to do.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Washington know of any law that has been passed through Congress which provides that the company selling a certain article for such consumption as this has to put a price upon it? Does he know of any railroad safety-appliance law which Congress has passed since the gentleman has been a Member in which it ever put any price on the appliance of any company supplying it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know. I am not qualified to answer that question. But I do know in this particular case where the power to fix the price rests. It rests with these wireless companies. I think there are seven reported, but only two or three, in fact, can furnish the equipment.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I want to know if the gentleman knows any law passed by Congress restricting the price of any product that should be consumed under that law.

Mr. MANN. What has the gentleman to say about the gas proposition?

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I am talking about patented appliances.

Mr. GREENE. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 27672 is very simple and easily understood. It provides that it shall be unlawful for any ocean-going steamer certified to carry, or carrying, 50 passengers or more, to engage in the business of carrying passengers or to carry passengers between ports 200 miles or more apart unless equipped with an efficient radio-telegraphic apparatus, in charge of a person skilled in the use of such apparatus, with suitable penalties for the violation of the law. It was necessary to place some limitation in the law as to the steamers to which it should apply. The committee, in view of the fact that this is a new invention, and not wishing to impose any hardship on the shipping interests, thought it wise to limit the law to those vessels carrying 50 passengers or more. Then, again, the question came up for consideration as to whether or not the law should apply only to seagoing vessels or should include traffic on the Great Lakes. The committee were also called upon to consider whether or not the radio-telephone as well as radio-telegraph should be included in the bill. The bill was not made to apply to radio-telephone communication for the reason that the hearings disclosed that the radio-telephone is not of proven efficiency at greater distances than 25 miles. Indeed, there was testimony that 12 miles is the present limit. Hence it became apparent that it would have been unwise for the bill to provide for radio-communication, as it would have left it to the vessel owner to install the radio-telegraph or radio-telephone, and in the opinion of the committee the radio-telephone under its present limitations would not meet the needs of the service.

The committee had in view primarily the trans-Atlantic service, although the bill applies as well to steamers engaged in the coastwise trade. It was our purpose to provide for a service that would be effective on the high seas and at great distances. The wireless telephone would be of little or no value if an accident should occur to a vessel more than 25 miles distant from another vessel, although the other vessel should be provided with radio apparatus, or at a greater distance than 25 miles from a wireless station on shore. In the case of the recent disaster to the steamer Republic, radio-telephones would have been of little or no value, and having in mind the limited area in which the radio-telephone now has any possible value, the committee wisely, I think, excluded its use from the provisions of the bill. Science and invention are making rapid strides in the development of the radio-telephone, and the time may come in the near future when its efficiency may be as great as the wireless telegraph service. When that time comes it will be an easy matter to extend the law to include the radio-telephone, and we will welcome that time, as it will not then be necessary to keep an expert operator aboard ship to operate it, as is true of the radio-telegraph.

Radio-telephones were installed on our battle ships prior to their departure on their world voyage. We took particular pains to inquire of a representative of the Navy Department who appeared before the committee if the service had proven satisfactory even as a means of communication for short distances, and he stated that it had not, and this was an additional reason why we did not include this service in the bill.

The bill was not made to apply to the Great Lakes for several reasons, the main one being that there are now only three or four wireless stations on the Great Lakes, and they are under private control, whereas the Atlantic and Gulf and Pacific coasts are provided with government wireless stations, and hence are free from private control.

Again, the need is not pressing. The trips on the Great Lakes are short, we are told, and the steamers rarely out of sight of land except for brief intervals, and relief generally near at hand and within call by the distress signals now in use.

Great emphasis has been given by some to the objections that the bill does not safeguard the vessel owner and the public against extortionate charges for the service, and that the bill should limit the cost of installation and the rates to be charged for wireless messages.

It is enough to say that this method of communication is yet in its infancy; it is scarcely more than 8 years old, and it is only recently that the service has been reduced to a commercial basis. New discoveries and inventions are occurring rapidly, which tend to cheapen the cost of the apparatus as well as of the service, and it would be impracticable now to frame a law to regulate the price that manufacturers should charge for the apparatus or the cost of the service.

Although the Interstate Commerce Commission was created more than twenty years ago, it has not yet been given the power to regulate the rates that may be charged by railroad, telegraph, and express companies engaged in interstate business, and it was not thought sufficient reason why the safety-appliance law should not be enacted that it did not limit the price that manufacturers might charge for the appliances, although the inducement offered to manufacturers to combine was as great or greater than is the inducement for manufacturers of radio apparatus to do so. It might be well enough to remind the gentlemen who have urged this objection with so much zeal that our antitrust laws apply with equal force to such a combination as they apprehend may be formed should this bill become a law as to any other trust or monopoly, and while the committee would have been glad to relieve the shipping interests of this danger, yet, for the reasons that I have stated, we do not regard it practicable to do so at this time. But the committee took a wider view of the matter than simply the one involving dollars and cents. We thought the safety of human life of paramount importance. When we contemplate the appalling loss of life on the high seas in the past, the committee should be excused if in our desire to mitigate the perils of the sea we do not present to the House a bill as perfect and comprehensive in its provisions as time and the future developments of science and invention may make necessary.

This bill was framed to better secure human life, and if its enactment into law results in greater safety to those who travel the seas our object in some measure will have been accomplished and the author of the bill will earn for himself the gratitude of mankind.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, one astonishing feature of this discussion is the statement that comes from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with respect to the character of this legislation, the assertion that it is sympathetic. The very fact that the father of the pure-food bill, upon which rests his fame in this land, should rise in his place in the halls of Congress and suggest that it is proper to oppose legislation because it is of a "sympathetic" character is so preposterous that it furnishes its own answer.

Now, in the first place this is a humanitarian proposition. As to the statement that only two or three companies are engaged successfully in the operation of these instruments, I believe the gentlemen who make them are not correctly informed. There are at least seven companies now in existence successfully operating the instruments or appliances which would be within the province of this act.

The names and field of operations covered by them appear from the following table, furnished me by Commissioner Chamberlain, of the Bureau of Navigation:

RADIO-TELEGRAPHIC SYSTEMS.

MARCONI.

The first practical system in the field. The first Marconi British patent was applied for on the 2d of June, 1896, and accepted on the 2d of July, 1897.

DE FOREST.

American in origin; acquired in Great Britain, and it is said for all parts of the world except North America, by a British company.

FESSENDEN.

American.

LODGE-MUIRHEAD.

British, both as regards invention and ownership. First patent applied for 10th of May, 1897; accepted 10th of August, 1898.

TELEFUNKEN ("FAR SPEAKING").

German; an amalgamation of the systems of several different inventors (Slaby, Arco, Braun, Siemens).

ROCHFORT.

French.

BRANLY POPP.

French.

POULSEN.

Danish; a recent invention, the rights of which for all parts of the world have also been acquired by the Amalgamated Radiotelegraphic Company.

SHOEMAKER.

American.

MASSIE.

American.

COMPANIES OPERATING IN UNITED STATES.

Vessels in trade with the United States are now equipped with installations furnished by companies using the following systems:

1. Marconi.
2. United Wireless (which is a combination of the De Forest and Shoemaker systems).
3. Fessenden.
4. Massie.
5. Stone (relatively new company).
6. Colliers (a relatively new company).

It is also possible that some vessels in trade with the United States may be equipped with the Telefunken (German), Poulsen (Danish), or some of the other systems.

Mr. WALDO. I should like to ask whether the shipping interests of New York have been consulted on this?

Mr. BURKE. The shipping interests of New York have been consulted, and on the very day that the measure under discussion was proposed the directors of the Produce Exchange of New York City, by a unanimous vote, indorsed the measure. Subsequently the president of the Maritime Association of New York, Mr. Norman, communicated with the committee through a New York Representative [Mr. BENNET], stating that he did not find on the floor of the exchange one dissenting voice, and he said: "I trust our entire New York delegation will lend their best endeavors to have the law enacted at this session."

Its expediency is also evidenced by the following letter written to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] after we had revised the bill:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, February 4, 1909.

SIR: In view of the suggestion of your committee that Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania confer with the Commissioner of Navigation and the Supervising Inspector-General, Steamboat-Inspection Service, for the purpose of suggesting such amendments or revision of the bill heretofore introduced by Mr. BURKE in order to make the same as practicable and as efficient as possible, all things being considered, we beg to state that the revision made and incorporated in the bill, which will be presented by Mr. BURKE in substitution, meets our hearty approval, and we believe it will accomplish more nearly than any other legislation suggested the purposes in view.

Respectfully,

GEO. UHLER,
Supervising Inspector-General Steamboat-Inspection Service.
E. T. CHAMBERLAIN,
Commissioner of Navigation.

To the Hon. WM. S. GREENE,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Now, as to the necessity of this legislation, Mr. Speaker, there are now in round numbers practically one-half the vessels that would be affected by it already complying with it. During the last year there were coming into the United States ports from foreign countries 149 ships, with a capacity of 182,144 passengers, which ships were equipped with the wireless instruments. There were entering these ports from foreign countries 97 foreign ships not equipped and having a capacity of 135,749 passengers. There were also 19 American vessels which were equipped, mainly on the Pacific Ocean, and having a very large passenger capacity. There were also 33 American ships engaged in the foreign trade not equipped. So that, speaking generally, one-half the vessels to which this legislation would apply are already equipped, and one-half are not.

Now, as to the necessity of the legislation and the question of a possibility of a monopoly arising, that is completely answered by the legislation enacted by the last two Congresses, introduced by gentlemen on this floor. There is no more possibility or probability of monopoly in the wireless business than there is in any other, as the antitrust laws enacted by past Congresses would apply to it just the same as to other monopolies. Its importance to humanity is so great that I trust its enactment to-day will result in America leading the world in this commendable field of human endeavor, as she has always done since the establishment of the Republic.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Is it not a fact that the Western Union-Postal Telegraph Company did agree less than two years ago to raise its rates from 20 to 60 per cent, and is it not a fact that if you want to send a wireless message you will have to send it by this one combination, and did not Commissioner Neill to-day make the statement that the operators' wages are lower now than they were in 1883?

Mr. BURKE. That question is irrelevant.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE. I ask unanimous consent that Members who have spoken on the bill be given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent to present an amendment to be inserted on page 2, line 17, after the word "apparatus," "to cost no more than the prices now prevailing."

The SPEAKER. That amendment can be considered only by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has passed. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments, the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. COCKRAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCKRAN. What is the motion—to amend the bill or pass it?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to agree to all the amendments, including the last one, and pass the bill. It is all one motion.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 23.

Accordingly (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 231, authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish additional statistics.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish, in addition to the cotton reports now being made by him, statistics of stocks of baled cotton in the United States, to be summarized as of November 1, December 1, January 1, and March 1.

The following committee amendment was read:

In line 7 strike out the words "December first."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to present consideration?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LEVER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF SURFACE ENTRYMEN.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 24834) for the protection of the rights of surface entrymen, as amended by the committee amendments, and, with an amendment which I send to the desk, to suspend the rules and the bill be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report, with the committee amendments and the amendment as a substitute, and the bill be passed.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has in good faith heretofore located, selected, or entered under the nonmineral land laws of the United States any lands which subsequently are classified, claimed, or reported as being valuable for coal, may, if he shall so elect, and upon making satisfactory proof of compliance with the laws under which such lands are claimed, receive a patent therefor, which shall contain a reservation to the United States of all coal in said lands, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal, but no person shall enter upon said lands to prospect for, or mine and remove coal therefrom, without previous consent of the owner under such patent, except upon such conditions as to security for and payment of all damages to such owner caused thereby as may be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That the owner under such patent shall have the right to mine coal for use on the land for domestic purposes prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposit: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to affect or abridge the right of any locator, selector, or entryman to a hearing for the purpose of determining the character of the land located, selected, or entered by him, and to a patent without reservation if the land shall be determined not to be chiefly valuable for coal, or to abridge or deny the right of any entryman who has earned a title to the land covered by his entry to a patent without reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GRONNA. I demand a second.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wyoming is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from North Dakota to twenty minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think I can best explain the purposes of this bill by reading from the report which I made on the bill:

"The necessity for this legislation arises from the fact that it is often difficult for an entryman, settler, or locator under the nonmineral laws to determine at the time of his location or entry as to the coal or noncoal character of the lands he locates, because the occurrence of thin strata of coal or of considerable bodies of low-grade lignites on land does not necessarily take it out of the class of lands that can be located and acquired for agricultural purposes or under the nonmineral, land laws, and, further, because coal may occur in quantities at a considerable depth beneath the surface of the land without there being anything on the surface or in the locality to indicate the presence of such a deposit.

"Therefore, nonmineral entrymen have in many cases, in perfect good faith, gone on lands which contain thin veins of coal, or coal of low grade and not of merchantable quality, or which was, unknown to him, underlaid at some depth by considerable coal veins, and in many cases lands of this character have been patented under the agricultural-land laws.

"In various parts of the West, particularly in western North Dakota and eastern Montana, and to a lesser extent in South Dakota and elsewhere, there are very large areas of very low-grade lignites. These, particularly in certain portions of the areas, are of but very little value, except for fuel for domestic purposes on or in the immediate vicinity of the lands, and for years these lands have been homesteaded and patented without a thought on the part of anyone that they contained valuable coal. Some portions of these fields, however, contain coal that is of somewhat better quality, and in several Western States, notably Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, and Montana, are coal areas where the coal is of a better quality, but where the surface indications do not point to coal deposits of value and nonmineral entrymen have in many cases in good faith made locations.

"In July, 1906, and later, very large areas of land were withdrawn from entry on the theory that they contained coal or that they were within known coal areas. Later these orders of withdrawal were modified so that such of the lands as were in fact noncoal lands might be entered, and in 1907 the Geological Survey began an investigation of the coal area in various Western States for the purpose of determining the character and extent of the deposits, and of classifying the coal lands for the purpose of fixing a schedule of prices for the same.

"About the same time the General Land Office adopted the policy of placing under suspension all nonmineral final certificates which had been issued on lands within areas believed to contain coal, and has declined to issue patents on the same pending the ascertainment whether such lands were known to contain coal prior to the issuance of final certificate. Two thousand seven hundred and seventy-one such tracts entered under the homestead and desert land laws are now held in suspension. Since the coal land withdrawals no final certificates in the regular form have been issued on final proof on homesteads and desert entries within areas embraced in coal withdrawals or reported as coal lands, a special form of receipt for the money paid being the only evidence of title given to the entryman.

"A search of the public-land records indicates that 11,688 original homestead and desert entries are of record within known or reported coal areas, or areas which have been withdrawn as coal land. Since the investigation and classification of coal lands began and up to January 9, 1909, the special agents of the General Land Office had made investigation and submitted report on 3,240 entries and selections of all kinds reported as coal lands, and they have reported 943 of these as coal lands and 2,297 as having no coal, or as not having coal of a quality or value sufficient to prevent entry under the nonmineral-land laws.

"From the above it will be seen that there are in the neighborhood of 19,000 cases which might eventually be somewhat affected by this legislation. However, as the final entries are only about one in five of the original entries, the number of original entries which might be affected is probably much less than the total of such entries. Further, in the case of the first class of entries mentioned the question being not as to the coal character of the land, but as to whether the land was known to contain coal at the time of or prior to final proof, the number of these cases which would be affected might be comparatively small, and in cases where proof has been made and no certificate issued, many entrymen will no doubt be able to prove the noncoal character of their land; but, making due allowances for all these exceptions, it is clear that a large number of entries must be directly affected by the legislation, and that if no legislation is had the entryman will in many cases lose all his rights in the land claimed and improved by him.

"In a large number of cases a hearing would probably result in the land being declared by the government officials noncoal land, for it is notorious that many suspended entries are in regions that contain no coal at all or no coal of any value. Many of the entries have been suspended simply because they are located within a township in which a coal declaratory statement has at some time been made. Many other entries, as in the case of North Dakota and eastern Montana, are suspended because in a general region of inferior lignite coals, and the probability is that in the majority of cases it would not be held upon a hearing that these lands were valuable for coal. In many cases unnecessary hardship and expense has been laid upon the entryman by reporting as coal lands large areas which contain no coal at all, or veins of such character or quality as to exclude them from what may properly be classed as coal lands. Such entrymen must defend their claims at very considerable cost, or, as matters now stand, lose their land.

"It is undoubtedly true, however, that in some of the coal-land States, at least, homesteads and other classes of nonmineral entries have in good faith been placed upon lands which do contain valuable coal, though in most cases of this kind it would probably require drilling or sinking to definitely establish that fact.

"In this condition of affairs some legislation seems to be necessary. It has been suggested that a law be passed granting to all homestead settlers who have settled upon land in good faith prior to this time a title to their lands in fee without regard to whether the land contains coal or not. Such legislation would relieve entrymen from the necessity of defending at hearings, and the probability is that in a large majority of the cases now pending all lands thus patented would contain little coal of any considerable value. But since 1873, when Congress passed the coal-land law and first began to place a price on coal land above that charged for agricultural lands, Congress has not attempted to determine as to the coal or noncoal character of any particular tract, and it is quite certain that a law granting all who have heretofore made nonmineral entries in good faith a fee title to their land would enable some to secure land which may ultimately, if it is not at the present time, be of some considerable value for the coal which it contains.

"This being true, the legislation in question has been adopted. It takes no right from the nonmineral entryman which he now has, but it does give him the opportunity to elect, if he sees fit to do so, to take a patent to his land with a reservation in the United States of the coal in all cases where the character of the land has been called into question.

"Should this bill become a law, the probability is that a considerable number of entrymen, the character of whose lands has been or may hereafter be challenged, would immediately elect to take a title with a reservation, rather than demand and pay the expense of a hearing before the register and receiver of the land office to determine the character of the land. These hearings involve an expense of all the way from $50 to as high as $200 or $300 or possibly $500 for each entry of 160 acres of land. In many cases the entryman's financial condition precludes the possibility of his making a defense at such a hearing. In other cases the entryman would consider that his land was not sufficiently valuable to warrant the expenditure necessary, or a condition of poverty joined with one of small value in the claim would often exist, and in such cases the entryman would take his patent with a reservation.

"Your committee realizes that the Government ought not to compel an entryman to defend his entry for any slight or trivial cause. It is unfortunately true that the coal withdrawals have been so sweeping, and the boundaries within which the entries have been held up on a claim of coal value by the Government have been so wide, that many entrymen have been called upon to defend their entries where, as a matter of fact, there is but little, if any, foundation for the claim that the land contains coal of value. However, it is undoubtedly true, as has already been stated, that some lands taken under the nonmineral land laws do contain valuable deposits of coal, though the probability is that such lands are but a small percentage of the lands the character of which has been called in question.

"While a certain class of entrymen would take their limited title rather than demand a hearing, the probability is that the majority of entrymen would insist upon a hearing, and in some of such cases the land would no doubt be held by the department to be valuable for coal. These men, if we have no legislation, would ultimately lose their lands and improvements, and it is imperative that legislation for their relief be had.

"As the bill is drawn the entryman can exercise his right to elect to take his patent with a reservation at any time prior to the cancellation of his entry. For instance, if the entryman is notified that his land is claimed to be valuable for coal and that it will be held for cancellation, pending which he may ask for a hearing to determine the character of the land, he may thereupon elect to accept his title with a reservation, or he may demand a hearing, and if the final decision in his case be in favor of the contention that the land is chiefly valuable for coal, then he may exercise his right to take a patent with a reservation of the coal.

"Should any considerable number of the entrymen as to whose land the question of its coal character has been raised conclude to take a patent without trying the matter out at a hearing, the probability is that but a limited portion of the lands so patented would contain any considerable quantity of coal; but in view of the fact that some of the lands covered by these limited patents would contain coal which sometime would be valuable, it is important that there be some method whereby these deposits may be disposed of, and therefore provision is made that they shall be disposed of in accordance with the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal.

"Care has been exercised to protect the surface rights of the entrymen from any damage which might arise in connection with the prospecting, mining, or removal of the coal, and it is believed that the rights of the owner under the patent will be amply protected.

"The first proviso of the bill accords the owner under the patent the right to mine coal upon his land for domestic purposes thereon. This was believed to be a wise and just provision and will probably incline some entrymen to accept the limited fee rather than go to the expense of defending at a hearing.

"The second proviso of the bill is to the effect that nothing in the legislation shall be held to affect or abridge the right of an entryman to a hearing to determine the character of his land and to a patent in fee if it shall be held that the land is not chiefly valuable for coal, or to abridge or deny the right of any entryman to a fee title who has earned the same. This proviso was believed to be necessary to make it clear that there is no intent to coerce anyone into taking a limited patent or to take from anyone who has earned a title, by residence or otherwise, his right to a patent now clearly recognized."

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I should be glad to.

Mr. MANN. Based upon two statements in the report, one of which is:

In a large number of cases a hearing would probably result in the land being declared by the government officials noncoal land, for it is notorious that many suspended entries are in regions that contain no coal at all or no coal of any value. Many of the entries have been suspended simply because they are located within a township in which a coal declaratory statement has at some time been made.

Again:

It is unfortunately true that the coal withdrawals have been so sweeping, and the boundaries within which the entries have been held up on a claim of coal value by the Government have been so wide, that many entrymen have been called upon to defend their entries where, as a matter of fact, there is but little, if any, foundation for the claim that the land contains coal of value.

Now, what I want to ask is, Why does not the department itself correct this difficulty?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for the department, having made a serious mistake, to fully correct that mistake. All the statements made in that report are absolutely true and borne out by the facts, the withdrawals have been too general, but, as the gentleman from Illinois will recall, the report goes on to say that of all the cases that have been suspended on the five-year proof or on proof upon which final certificate was issued and of cases where the final certificate has been withheld and of cases yet to come before the department within these withdrawals, there will be some cases unquestionably where the Government will be able to prove its contention that the land contains coal of value.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman state in what percentage of cases, in his judgment, the Government will be enabled to make their claim good?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is asking one to take a good deal of responsibility to answer a question of that kind. It is a matter of opinion. I know of one territory where over 100,000 acres was withdrawn as coal land in which there is no question at all in the mind of anyone who knows the situation that there is no coal of any sort or kind within that 100,000 acres.

Mr. MANN. When the gentleman says there is no question in the mind of anyone at all, that is all right, but how can the department justify itself in declaring that there is coal there, suspending entries, if it does not believe that there is coal there?

Mr. MONDELL. In my opinion the department can not justify itself, and I do not believe that anyone can justify the action of calling on entrymen to defend at a hearing in regions where there is no good ground for believing the land is valuable for coal.

Mr. MANN. That is a pretty sweeping indictment against our officials in the Land Department.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have made quite as sweeping statements on the same subject in the House before.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman has never been sustained by the House before.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I want the gentleman to remember that my view as to the number of cases that would be affected does not affect this legislation at all. Assuming that there was only 1 per cent of these cases in which the entryman would be finally unable to prove the noncoal character of his land, you must do something for that entryman or say to him that he shall not retain his improvements.

It was not my intent, Mr. Speaker, in connection with this legislation to go into any criticism of the department in the matter of withdrawals. I have voiced that criticism heretofore and in the day of the original withdrawals, when I called attention to the very difficulties that were bound to occur, and which have occurred.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to know the difference between this law which the gentleman proposes and the law as it now exists. What change is proposed, and why?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, at present if the department can prove in the case of any one of the 2,000 entrymen, who have made final proof and to whom certificates have been issued, but patent withheld, that there was good reason to believe that the land was valuable for coal before final proof, then the department can entirely dispossess that entryman. In the cases where proof has been offered and final certificate withheld, in the cases upon which proof is yet to be offered, if the entryman is unable to disprove the department's contention that the land is chiefly valuable for coal, then he loses all right to the land and his improvement. This bill simply provides that in any case where, subsequent to the location or the entry, the character of the land has been called into question the entryman may, if he so elect, accept a limited patent. It is the first legislation before Congress providing for a limited patent, or a patent reserving the mineral. It is necessary in the opinion of our committee by reason of the conditions that exist. In some instances the entryman will accept the limited patent without making an effort to disprove the department's allegation that his land is valuable for coal, because in some cases the entryman will not feel he can afford to pay the expense of contesting the case; but should the entryman in any particular case contest with the Government and the Government sustain its contention, he may still accept his limited patent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that valuable minerals are reserved now to the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. No; that is not true. The patent having issued, the patent carries everything in the land with it, and the Supreme Court has decided in a number of cases that if the law be complied with in good faith and the entryman makes payment and final proof, thereafter the Government is barred from raising the question as to any mineral that may occur in the land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That applies also to oil and coal?

Mr. MONDELL. It applies to all kinds of minerals. In other words, the patents issued by the Government of the United States heretofore have been patents in fee.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Could the gentleman better arrive at what he desires by only patenting the surface of the land and reserving all minerals, precious and otherwise?

Mr. MONDELL. That has been discussed at some length, and the Committee on Public Lands is not of the opinion that that ought to be done. We believe this is quite a sufficient departure from the past practice of the Government. The lands which this legislation will affect are lands which the department has claimed contain some coals of value.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not this a step in that direction of issuing limited patents?

Mr. MONDELL. It is; and I trust it is as far as we will go in that direction.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If it is a good law, why not go the full length and declare nothing passes except the surface?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is a good law for this reason: Coal occurs oftentimes under conditions that render it impossible for the settler to know in advance with regard to the presence of coal beneath the surface of the ground.

But if the Government clearly demonstrates before the entryman has earned a patent that the land is more valuable for coal than for agricultural purposes, the agricultural entryman can scarcely expect to secure a patent in fee, and in order that these coal lands, some of which will not, perhaps, be mined for hundreds of years, may not be reserved that length of time from settlement or cultivation or improvement when their surface is such as to make cultivation and improvement possible, in order that the development of the country may go on, in order that the entryman who in good faith has gone upon the land may not lose the improvements, the committee brought in this bill. It has been very carefully considered. We had some five or six meetings of considerable length in which every phase and feature of the question was discussed, and, in my opinion and in the opinion of a majority of the committee, the legislation is wise and ought to be passed. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, one of the provisions of this bill I think merits rather careful consideration, and that is that part of it referring to the damages that are to be paid to the owner of the surface in case any attempt is made to prospect on the land for coal or to undertake mining operations afterwards thereon. I want to read the lines referring to the payment of damages:

The coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal, but no person shall enter upon said lands to prospect for, or mine and remove coal therefrom, without previous consent of the owner under such patent, except upon such conditions as to security for and payment of all damages to such owner caused thereby as may be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Now, I would ask the lawyers of this body just what is meant by the language that I have read. A reservation is made here and a right given to enable the holder of the reservation to obtain its beneficial use. The United States Government, or anyone under its direction, may go upon this land to do these several things: Prospect for coal, mine coal, remove coal from the land; but all damages caused thereby, to wit, by the prospecting, by the mining, by the removal of coal—all damages caused thereby must be paid, and before any attempt is made to do any one of these things such payment must be secured. Now, of course, it is not intended, and can not be intended, to reserve the right to take coal from the land, but to render the person taking such coal liable to damages for its removal and for mining it. The language is not well chosen. It is not a good piece of legislation. It is ambiguous and it is uncertain. If passed, in my opinion, the language will not express the intent of Congress. I am opposed to this bill. I think it should be clearly stated for just what these damages shall be paid—damages for injuries to the land affecting its use for agricultural purposes; damages for injuries to any improvements that may be upon the land. I do not think this criticism is too fine or too technical. It is better to define the things for which damages shall be paid than to use the broad general statement which gives rise to uncertainty.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, this measure has been undoubtedly thought out and worked out carefully by the committee, and it affords partial relief to a small percentage of our people; and, in view of that, there are some of us, perhaps, who will accept it as being the only thing that we can get at this time. The condition is this in my State, and I think it is in no wise different in other States affected by this legislation, except that, perhaps, a larger percentage of coal in North Dakota is not more valuable for commercial purposes than in the other States: Under the direction of the Geological Survey there have been withdrawn in North Dakota something over 100 townships. Patents are withheld where final receipts were issued before withdrawal, and proofs offered after the withdrawal are also held up. These 100 townships have not been classified; they are withdrawn pending classification; and where in a township there is a single quarter section supposed to contain coal, the whole township has been withdrawn, and patents and proofs within that township are all held up until each individual case can be investigated by the coal-land inspector.

And in every instance where proof is ordered a fraud charge is entered against the entryman, and in all several thousand of these cases are listed among the so-called "fraud-charge cases." I have the figures for my State, taken from the reports of the coal-land inspectors, which show that 80 per cent of them are found not to contain coal. Twenty per cent are reported by the inspectors as containing coal, and under existing law these entrymen are given a chance for a hearing, the burden of proof being put upon the settlers to show that there is no coal of commercial value under those lands. And I want to say to you, gentlemen—and I believe I make an absolutely conservative statement—that when all of this process has been gone through, not in 5 per cent of the cases will the Government be able to maintain their claims. I think 2 per cent is nearer right. Eighty per cent are put to serious inconvenience and annoyance and damage of waiting a year or more. Twenty per cent of them are put to the expense of a hearing that is almost intolerable. And what is the result of all this? In 2, or at the most 5, per cent of the cases the Government may be able to show that there is coal of commercial value, and even in those cases the homesteader will in all probability have entered in good faith and is entitled to a full patent. I want to tell you this is a case of bad faith on the part of the Government with the honest homesteader that is well-nigh unbearable. If the Members of this House understood the conditions as I do, they would agree with me that every man who has entered his land in good faith, having complied with the law, is entitled to a full patent for these lands instead of a surface patent.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. With pleasure.

Mr. PARSONS. Assuming that the coal under the lands is good, merchantable coal, then does the gentleman think the entryman ought to be entitled to get the coal as well as the surface of the land?

Mr. MARSHALL. Not if he knew there was coal there; but if his neighbors who entered before him got patents alongside of him, and he entered his land believing there was no coal, then there is no excuse for this Government (not having classified those lands) to take a home away from the man who has rightly earned it. Such cases as the gentleman from New York describes are very rare in North Dakota. I do not believe in the State there are 5 per cent of them. They are so few that there is no excuse for the withdrawal of this great body of land and thereby causing untold worry, inconvenience, and loss, and sometimes suffering to so many honest homesteaders.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize that the department has laid this obligation of defending their entries upon more people than they should have laid that obligation upon in the gentleman's State, but if the legislation does not pass, what is going to happen to your entryman who can not disprove the allegation?

Mr. MARSHALL. He will certainly lose his land, but I will reach that in a minute. Now, under the workings of this bill if it becomes a law, a report having come from the coal inspector holding that there is coal under the land, the entryman can take two courses. First, if he feels satisfied there is no coal under his land, or is too poor to pay the expense of a hearing, he can take a surface patent; second, he can have a hearing, and in the end, if it is held at the hearing that coal underlies his land, then this bill will save the land to that entryman, who would otherwise lose it; and if that were not the case, I certainly would not consider the bill with any favor whatever.

It will help a few people, and, so far as I am able to judge, the rights of those who accept surface patents are fully protected, as they are fully insured against damages of all kinds. If I had an opportunity to offer an amendment to this bill under our rules, I would offer one in the words of the bill which I introduced and which has been pending before the Committee on Public Lands, providing that where entries had been made in good faith, and after full compliance with the law, full patents should issue. I would also provide, if I had an opportunity to amend this bill, that the settlers should have the perpetual use of the coal for domestic purposes instead of during the time that the Government owns it, as the bill provides. This coal in our State amounts to nothing more than a little timber lot. I would rather have 5 acres of good timber than the coal on one of these average quarters in North Dakota.

I have always maintained that the Government committed a grave error when it did not classify these lands before entries were permitted, and it is doing a very great wrong in undertaking to classify them after so many entries have been made and gone to patent, and thereby discriminating between neighbors. It is a matter of common knowledge that practically all of these lands in North Dakota are very much more valuable right now for agriculture than for coal, and the department should so classify them and relieve the distressful condition.

I am thoroughly in accord with the great movement looking to the conservation of our national resources, but to undertake to classify lands with a view of reserving the coal after homesteaders have entered upon them in perfect good faith and complied with the law in every respect, and thereby acquired sacred rights to them, is a preposterous thing and, in view of all that has gone before, is, to put it plainly, bad faith. There are numberless cases where men have filed in good faith, say, five or six years ago, some having commuted in fourteen months and received their patents, while others adjoining them are now refused patents after five or more years of faithful residence and the expenditure of everything they could earn to make improvements. Can anybody justify this or cite a more flagrant case of bad faith on the part of the Government, whose business it is to protect and care for our homesteaders rather than to harass them or break faith with them?

If the department fails to relieve the situation, then it is the plain duty of Congress to pass my bill granting everyone who has entered in good faith a full patent after having complied with the homestead laws. Our homesteaders demand full patents; they have rightly earned them, and they should have them. They are entitled to a square deal and expect the Government to carry out its part of the agreement in good faith, and that, too, without subjecting them to the annoyance, serious loss, long delays, and the heavy expense of unnecessary hearings.

Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the short time allotted to me will not permit the presentation of the rights of our homesteaders more fully. In the absence of relief from the department or from Congress there is only one thing for them to do, and that is to fight. My advice is for them to unite and make one or more test cases in each township, and, having won these, possibly the Government may withdraw its charges in the other case, or, at least, it will be easier to try them out. These cases will throw light on the subject and do much to bring the Secretary of the Interior to a full realization of our conditions, and, having this, I am confident the Secretary will do everything in his power to relieve our conditions.

The question of the legal status of a surface patent, which is raised by this bill, is so entirely new in North Dakota that I desire to print in the RECORD a letter from Hon. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, but in doing so I do not desire to assume responsibility for or sympathy with any statement in the letter, but am simply submitting it for what it is worth to those who might be interested:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Washington, February 6, 1909.

Hon. THOMAS F. MARSHALL,
United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MARSHALL: Continuing a recent conversation with you regarding the separation of surface and mineral rights, in which you expressed the opinion that if only the surface rights were given to the settler, banks and others loaning money would not consider this sufficient security on which to advance the funds which the settler needs for his improvements, for the reason that the reservation of coal or other minerals would be a cloud on his title.

It is my opinion, after a careful consideration of the law and of the practice in this and other countries, that this danger is fanciful rather than real. The apprehension that a reservation of minerals is a cloud on the title arises from the consideration of certain mining agreements, which include both surface and mineral rights; in these cases the mining company acquires not only the mineral but so much of the surface as may be needed in connection with mining operations. This is clearly a cloud on the title of the surface owner, for the simple reason that he has parted with a portion of his surface rights. This question is entirely apart from the fact that he has parted with mineral rights. It is not essentially different from permission to erect a factory on a piece of land. This right to erect a factory is clearly a disposal of certain rights in the surface, which can not be disposed of again so long as the right of the factory owner to occupy the ground exists. The right "to use so much of the surface as may be needed for mining" is a great cloud on the surface title, so great that it may extend to the extinguishment of the right to any of the land, and a property so encumbered would naturally not be considered as of any value as a security by a carefully managed loan company.

The case is entirely different when the ownership of the minerals is entirely separated from the ownership of the surface. The owner of the surface has no right to the minerals; the owner of the minerals has, on the other hand, no right to the surface. Under this condition the mineral is, according to numerous court decisions, a separate piece of real estate. Commenting on this, Barrows & Adams, in the Law of Mines and Mining of the United States, state.

"Although minerals undisturbed * * * usually belong to the owner of the soil, they are capable of separate ownership and distinct possession. When there is such a severance of estates, the minerals are real estate, constituting a separate corporeal hereditament capable of distinct inheritance and conveyance. There may be a further separation of the different strata, or of minerals of different kinds, each of which may have a different owner and constitute a distinct estate in land."

Among the court decisions are the following:

Adams v. Briggs Iron Company (7 Cush., 366, Mass.): "It is well settled that there may be a separate estate in mines and ores distinct from that of the land. There may be a severance of mines and a distinct estate and interest in them by grant or reservation. When so severed, and thus are constituted a distinct estate, mines are regarded as real estate, and the general laws regarding real estate will apply to them."

In Caldwell v. Fulton (31 Penn., 475) the court held that "coal and minerals in place are land and may be conveyed as such."

In Caldwell v. Copeland (37 Penn., 427) the court stated that "mines are land and subject to the same laws of possession and conveyance."

In Logan v. Washington Co. (29 Penn., 373) the rule was laid down that "where the owner of the coal land has sold the coal under his land to another, the owner of the land and the owner of the coal are each subject to a tax on real estate;" and in Brown v. Corey (43 Penn., 495) the court laid down the rule that "proceedings may be had against the owner of a stratum of coal as contradistinguished from the owner of the surface to obtain an underground right of way."

In Powell v. Lantzey (173 Penn., 543) the court further adds: "The owner of the mineral estate is neither a tenant in common nor a joint tenant with the owner of the surface; each has a separate estate."

I cite particularly from the Pennsylvania cases, for the reason that they involve matters of separation of coal from the surface and refer to a region where the separation of surface and mineral rights has been fully tried.

You can see the correctness of my position and the force of these rulings by considering the well-known fact that the owner of one piece of real estate may not injure an adjoining piece of real estate by undermining the wall along the common property line without being liable for damages. The fact that a piece of property is on a hillside and the retaining wall surrounding it may some time be undermined by the adjoining property owner is not considered by a loan company in the nature of a cloud on the title. The loan company knows, and everyone else knows, that while the owner of the lower property may so grade his land that he may undermine the retaining wall on the line between the two properties, the law requires that the lower property owner make good the damages to the man higher up the hill; so, if the law in the case of separation of surface and mineral rights provides that the owner of the mineral rights may only work them on payment of full compensation for damages to the owner of the surface, the interests of everyone are fully protected, and it can not be considered, even with the greatest stretch of the imagination, that there is any cloud upon the title of the surface owner.

The right of the mineral owner to develop his property (the mineral estate) on payment of compensation for damages to his adjoining property owner (the surface owner) to be determined by proper authority, is no greater cloud on a title than the right which to-day exists throughout the United States under which a railroad may appropriate private land for its own use on payment of full damages. A loan company would not refuse to accept a piece of property as security for the reason that it might some day be condemned for public use. This fact would really increase the value of the security.

A law which provides that patents shall be granted reserving to the Government all minerals and the right to use so much of the surface as is necessary to mine the same is clearly a cloud on the title of the surface owner, for the reason that it reserves not only the minerals but also a portion of the surface. Such a law should be strenuously opposed by you, for the reason that it will harm your constituents, and in objecting to a general law in this matter they evidently have such a law in mind. But a law which gives the surface entirely to the agriculturalist and provides for full compensation for any damages resulting from mining, simply creates two pieces of real property without a cloud on the title of either.

This is fully recognized throughout the eastern United States, particularly in the coal fields, where 90 per cent of the production comes from land where there is such a separation of surface and mineral rights. No question is here raised as to the suitability of a piece of property as a security for a loan when the complete ownership of the surface rests with the man seeking the loan. The fact that a new piece of real estate has been created by a division beneath the surface instead of upon the surface, as is more ordinarily the case, does not cloud the title of the absolute owner of either piece of real property.

I was just on the point of writing you, urging that, in my opinion, the only point needed to fully protect the interests of the citizens of North Dakota in the then pending Mondell bill was a provision that the owner of the surface should have the right to mine coal for use on the land for domestic and farm purposes, when I received the amended draft of the Mondell bill containing this provision, and I, therefore, delayed my letter until I could fully advise you on this matter of separate estates in the surface and minerals beneath it.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. OTIS SMITH, Director.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE].

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of reluctance that I oppose the passage of this bill. It is with reluctance, because the situation described by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is one crying aloud for relief, and for the further reason that I realize that the Committee on Public Lands has given to this question very careful consideration. I, however, am so firmly and thoroughly opposed to the new policy that is intended to be inaugurated by the passage of this bill, namely, the segregation of the surface from the other rights in the land, that I can not give the bill my support. It is said by gentlemen here that in not more than 5 per cent of these cases will the Government be able to sustain its contention that the land is coal land. Mr. Speaker, under such circumstances I think we ought not, in order to reach these few cases, to enter upon this new policy. I do not know just what relief ought to be given to these people, but it does seem to me there ought to be some way found by which when the entryman makes his final proof he can have it at once for all determined whether it is coal or agricultural land. If it is agricultural land, the entryman ought to get full patent for the land, and if coal land and known to be coal land, he ought not to get a patent at all to the coal land under an agricultural entry.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to ask the gentleman as to the suggestion made that a considerable number of entrymen would lose all their personal rights in homesteads.

Mr. BONYNGE. It would be so in a small number of cases. I agree with the gentleman in the statement that in not more than 5 per cent of these cases will the Government be able to prove that it is coal land and not agricultural land that has been entered, and to cover those few cases I do not think it would be wise to enter upon such a new and untried policy.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the gentleman misstates me.

Mr. MANN. He carefully refrained from giving that information.

Mr. BONYNGE. I may have been mistaken. It may have been the gentleman from North Dakota who made the statement that in not more than 5 per cent, and perhaps not in more than 2 or 3 per cent, of the cases would the Government be able to support its contention that it was coal land that was entered and not agricultural land, but I understood the statement to be made.

Mr. GRONNA. In my State. I yield one minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, in the space of one minute, of course, I can make no argument, but I invite the attention of the House to the very serious proposition presented in a case where the land contains coal. Neither the interests of the Government in the coal nor the interests of the farmer in the surface are protected in this bill in the least degree. It is a very difficult matter to provide a law for the invasion of a farm by one who is not going in for a public purpose. If one man owned the coal and another man owned the surface, it requires much more legal machinery than is set out in this bill to allow a man to invade his neighbor's farm for a private purpose.

Mr. MANN. If that be the case, he can not invade it. That may be what this bill means.

Mr. SMITH of California. If one man owns the coal and mines for it, there would be no relief for the farmer, and no means of relief for any injustice that would be done him are to be found in the terms of this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I do not object so much to the provisions of this bill as I do to what it omits. In our State it does not give us the relief sought. There are to-day nearly 2,000 cases pending where the entrymen have, by complying with the law, earned title to lands that have afterwards been classified as coal lands. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to criticise or say anything against the system adopted or the methods pursued by the Government, because I realize fully as much as any Member of this House that we are living in an age when we want to conserve the mineral resources of our country. I am heartily in favor of reserving the coal where it is found in such quantities and of such a character as to have commercial value.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides, among other things:

That nothing herein contained shall be held to affect or abridge the right of any locator, selector, or entryman to a hearing for the purpose of determining the character of the land located, selected, or entered by him, and to a patent without reservation if the land shall be determined not to be chiefly valuable for coal.

Now, what does this mean? It simply means this: The Government has practically challenged every entry in certain parts of our State. Every homesteader or entryman must go to the expense of a contest before he can make final proof of his entry. The burden of proof is wholly on the entryman. There are thousands of acres of land in our State that are underlaid with low-grade lignite coal, coal of such low grade that it has no commercial value; a grade of coal that no man of any business ability would undertake to mine for commercial purposes, although it may be worth something to the settler as fuel for domestic purposes. As I said, no man with ordinary business sagacity would undertake to mine this coal for commercial purposes; wherever such attempts have been made they have failed.

As the law now stands the burden of proof is upon the entryman, and it will cost every entryman from $300 to $400 to carry on a contest against the Government and establish that the land does not contain any coal of commercial value. This law contains these same provisions.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman refers to the expense of the contest. The gentleman, of course, understands that that expense is now laid upon the entryman by the department, that it is not laid on him by this legislation; that so far as the legislation affects this situation the effect is in the nature of a release.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not surprising that the homesteader of to-day, who feels that he is being prosecuted as a perpetrator of fraud, no matter how honest his intentions may be, looks back to the good old days when the homestead settler in the States farther east made his entry in the fertile valleys of those States, with forests above the surface and valuable mines underneath; mines valuable for both iron and coal, mines containing the best grade of coal, worth millions upon millions of dollars. The coal and other minerals were not reserved by the Government then; the entryman was given everything above and beneath the surface. In my opinion no objection should be raised now to giving bona fide settlers, who have located on 160 acres of land that is clearly agricultural land, full title to all that the land contains, although it may contain a substratum of lignite coal. I introduced a bill in this House (H. R. 27423) which provides—

That where public lands in the State of North Dakota have been entered in good faith for agricultural purposes under the homestead laws of the United States, and where full compliance with the requirements of the homestead laws is shown, final proof of such entries shall, when made in compliance with law, be accepted at the local land offices, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be required to issue patents for such lands, notwithstanding the fact that they may contain lignite coal.

Mr. Speaker, so far as my State is concerned there would be no danger of creating a monopoly in coal. It is true that lignite coal of a low grade has been found there and is being mined to-day. It is true that we have a few mines containing workable coal, but in most of the cases where homestead entries have been suspended, I will say that, in my judgment, in 90 per cent of the cases where the entries have been suspended patent will ultimately issue without any reservation whatever. In my opinion, the entryman has a right to the land in cases like these, because he earned a patent by entering the land and fulfilling all the requirements of the law before the land was classified as coal land.

The man with limited means, the homestead settler, has been the pioneer; he has paved the way for those more fortunate as regards means and money and made it possible for them to follow. Not only that, but these sturdy pioneers have always been found to be as patriotic and willing to make sacrifices for their country as any other class of citizens. And there is no valid reason why the homesteader of the present day should be discriminated against any more than there was in former days.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I tried to have this bill that is now pending amended in the committee so that it would give the entryman preference right to purchase the coal where the land proved to be coal land. I also offered another amendment, as follows:

That unless the Government shall have established within five years from the date of issuing patent to the surface that the land is chiefly valuable for coal, a patent in fee, without any reservation, should issue to the entryman.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that I can not be permitted, under the rules, to offer these amendments at this time; and while I feel that the bill does not contain what in my judgment it should, nor give the settlers in our State the relief that they should receive, I shall vote for it, as at least it takes nothing from them, but will permit them to take patent to the surface provided they may so elect, which I would not advise the entrymen of my State to do, because I believe they are entitled to a full patent of fee title, without any reservation whatever, and I presume that a contest to establish the agricultural character of the land will have to be carried on at the settler's expense.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the measure under consideration is not a bill that affects the people of my State in any way, but it is a matter that received careful consideration at the hands of the Public Lands Committee.

I very much dislike to differ in any manner from my colleagues on the committee, but it is my honest and faithful impression that they have a wrong conception of what this bill does. I favor the majority report and the passage of this bill for two reasons. First, I believe it helps the settler; second, I believe it reserves the right in the Government of the United States to save the coal and mineral deposits that they now possess. The difficulty that necessitates this legislation comes by reason of departmental withdrawal of lands from the public domain. The department, in their judgment, from time to time have withdrawn large tracts of land and denominated them mineral, coal, or asphalt lands, as the case might be.

In some instances they have reserved land that is not in truth and fact coal or mineral land. This bill reserves to the Government of the United States the mineral wealth where it does exist and permits the agricultural entryman to obtain and perfect his right to the surface, and it is my belief when an agricultural entryman enters land for agricultural purposes and it is found to be in truth mineral land, that is all he is rightfully entitled to. It never has been the province or intent of the public land law that an agricultural entryman going upon land to secure a home for himself should at the same time acquire mineral rights thereunder.

The measure in the event of conflict of rights enables the settler to acquire the surface and thereby carry on agriculture, and at the same time reserves inviolate to the Government the minerals, coal, or asphalt, as the case may be. It is not too much for an agricultural entryman to concede. It is not too much caution and prudence for the Government to exert. I hope the rule may be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG].

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly this bill ought to become a law. As I understand it, there are some 2,000 applications on file now upon which proof can be made; but if this bill is not passed, and the man who has made his proof is not financially able to maintain a contest with the Government as to whether there is coal under his land or not, then he must lose his land, because it has been classified as coal land.

Now, to the objection made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], I say that if a third party goes in upon the surface of land which has been granted to an applicant under this bill, and wants to prospect for, mine, or remove coal from that land, he ought to pay all damages done by him to the surface and improvements in such prospecting, mining, or removal. The bill provides that the party wanting to go in and prospect for, mine, or remove the coal must get the consent of the owner of the surface. If he does not succeed in getting that consent, then either party, as I take it from the language of this bill, may go into a court of competent jurisdiction and leave it to the court to say what damage will be done by the operations which are to be begun and carried out and what security is necessary under the circumstances of the case to protect the owner of the surface of the land. I say it is eminently just and right that it should be so.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to ask a question of the gentleman from Wyoming. Has the gentleman considered the propriety of changing the burden of proof, in the latter part of the paragraph? At present it would give the patent without reservation if the land shall be determined not to be chiefly valuable for coal. Would it not be better, instead of requiring him to prove a negative, to change the word "if" to "unless" and strike out the word "not," so that it would read "and to a patent without reservation unless the land shall be determined chiefly valuable for coal?" In other words, to put the burden where the law always puts it—upon the one seeking to establish the existence of the fact. It seems to me you now put the burden of proving a negative upon the entryman.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am rather of the opinion that the bill as it reads does not throw the burden of proof upon the entryman. Under the amendment as suggested by the gentleman it would perhaps throw the burden of proof rather more definitely on the Government, and I doubt whether it would be wise to do that in view of the fact that except by expensive drilling it would not be possible in some instances to absolutely determine the fact.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired, and all time has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to call attention to the amendment that I offered in line 19.

The SPEAKER. The amendment was incorporated in the gentleman's motion. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the bill was passed.

The title was amended.

UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY BAND.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4521) to reorganize and enlist the members of the United States Naval Academy Band, and that the same be now considered.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Naval Academy Band shall consist of one leader, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowance of a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps; one second leader, with pay at the rate of $50 per month; 29 musicians, first class, and 11 musicians, second class; and shall be paid from pay of the navy.

SEC. 2. That the members of the Naval Academy Band as now organized shall be enlisted in the navy and credited with all prior service of whatever nature as members of said band, as shown by the records of the Naval Academy and the pay rolls of the ships and academy; and the said leader and the enlisted musicians of the band shall be entitled to the same benefits in respect to pay, emoluments, and retirement arising from longevity, reenlistment, and length of service as are, or may hereafter become, applicable to other enlisted men of the navy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill recognizes the existing band at Annapolis?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice in the bill in one place it provides for a leader who shall have the rank of a second lieutenant.

Mr. DAWSON. I intend to offer an amendment striking out the word "rank." The leader of the band at West Point is without rank, although he has the pay and allowance of a second lieutenant, and the same is true of the Marine Band. It is my intention to offer an amendment striking out the word "rank."

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. MACON. Does this bill entail any increase of salary?

Mr. DAWSON. Very slight. The bill increases the number of enlisted men in the navy. It provides that the band at Annapolis shall be made up of enlisted men, the same as other bands, both in the army and the navy. For some reason that band has stood alone and occupied an anomalous position for a number of years.

I will put into the RECORD the report of the committee on the bill, and also a recent letter from the Secretary of the Navy. They are as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4521) to reorganize and enlist the members of the United States Naval Academy Band, having had the same under consideration, report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following substitute:

"That the Naval Academy Band shall consist of 1 leader, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowance of a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps; 1 second leader, with pay at the rate of $50 per month; 29 musicians, first class, and 11 musicians, second class, and shall be paid from pay of the navy.

"That the members of the Naval Academy Band as now organized shall be enlisted in the navy and credited with all prior service of whatever nature as members of said band, as shown by the records of the Naval Academy and the pay rolls of the ships and academy; and the said leader and the enlisted musicians of the band shall be entitled to the same benefits in respect to pay, emoluments, and retirement arising from longevity, reenlistment, and length of service as are or may hereafter become applicable to other enlisted men of the navy."

This bill places the Navai Academy Band on the same footing, as near as may be, with the Military Academy Band at West Point. A similar measure was favorably reported to the House last year as a part of the naval appropriation bill, the same having been favorably recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

The reorganization of the Naval Academy Band is strongly recommended by the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy for the years 1906 and 1907, as will be seen by the following extracts from the reports of the Board of Visitors, as follows:

"The band of the academy is the only one in the service, and in fact in either service, which is not composed of regularly enlisted men. It is not known how this anomalous situation grew up, but it ought no longer to continue. The musicians are employed under civil-service rules, and their pay is insufficient. It has accordingly to be supplemented by contributions from officers and midshipmen which is a condition of affairs not at all creditable to the Government. Some of the musicians are of advanced age, and are now barely able to perform their duties. The entire band should be put on a proper basis. It should be composed of enlisted men and there should be as many enlisted men in the band at Annapolis as there are in the band at West Point. The leader of the band should receive sufficient compensation to secure and hold a man equal at least to the present incumbent. (Extract from Report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy, 1906, p. 11.)

"The following recommendations are also unanimously made by the board for the reasons given: * * *

"That authority be given to enlist the Naval Academy band and make such changes in its size and in the compensation paid to the musicians and the bandmaster as may be required to put it on the same basis as the band at the United States Military Academy." (Extracts from the Report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy, 1907, pp. 2, 4.)

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 5, 1909.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 12th ultimo, requesting the views and recommendations of the department regarding the bill (H. R. 20389) "to equalize the rank, pay, and allowances of the bandmaster and sword master at the Naval Academy with corresponding positions at the Military Academy," you are informed that the department recommends that the pay and allowances of the sword master and the bandmaster at the Naval Academy be made to equalize those received by the sword master and bandmaster at the Military Academy, but does not recommend that rank be conferred upon them. The efficiency of these men would in no way be affected by conferring rank upon them. It should be noted that the leader of the Marine Band has the pay and allowances of a first lieutenant, United States Marine Corps, while the leader of the Military Academy band has the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant in the army; but at present they have not the rank of those grades. The sword master at the Military Academy, however, has, by act of March 3, 1905, the relative rank, pay, and allowances of a captain mounted.

Very respectfully,
TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 9, strike out the word "rank."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TRACHOMA AMONG THE INDIANS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following House bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28164) for the investigation, treatment, and prevention of trachoma among the Indians.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,000, to be immediately available to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to investigate, treat, and prevent the spread of the disease of trachoma among the Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I ask for a second.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, it has recently been discovered that the disease of trachoma, a very serious disease of the eye and which is exceedingly contagious, frequently leading to blindness, is very prevalent among the Indians, particularly in some schools of the Southwest, and more particularly in the school at Phoenix, Ariz., where out of a total school population of 557 the specialist who has been called in consultation has discovered that 400 pupils are affected with the disease, and of the 54 employees 21 have the disease.

A cursory examination discloses the fact that the disease is also prevalent in certain other schools of the Southwest, and also on the reservations. It is a disease for the prevention of which in the immigrant service we are spending a great deal of money and exercising the utmost care for its prevention; and it seems that it is necessary with the Indian children to take special precaution against the further spread of the disease.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the disease indigenous to this country?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is not indigenous to any particular country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not it an oriental disease that the Chinese brought in here?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know where it originated. It has been known in this country for some little time, but has been more prevalent during the recent years. Frankly, I can not answer the gentleman's question whether it originated with the Chinese or not. My impression is it did not.

Mr. BURLESON. And frequently occurs in public schools in the city of New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes; it occurs all over. I have known of acquaintances becoming infected with this disease from touching a doorknob, for instance, where one who had had the disease has passed through and touched it after rubbing the eye.

I have known of people taking it in street cars. It is a very virulent disease, contagious to an extreme degree, and frequently leads to blindness, and requires the utmost care to prevent contagion, and in a very large number of cases requires operation. It requires very great care in the way of nursing after the operation to prevent even more serious results.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is very prevalent among the Indians of the Southwest and among the lower class of Mexicans, and it is presumable that this is so on account of want of cleanliness.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course, want of cleanliness aggravates any disease, particularly a disease of the eye.

Mr. MANN. If any gentleman desires time in opposition to the bill, I will be glad to yield it. Otherwise I do not care to consume any time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 26916, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, with Mr. LAWRENCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to make investigations on Indian reservations and take measures for the purpose of preserving living and growing timber, and removing dead timber, standing or fallen; to advise the Indians as to the proper care of forests, and to conduct such timber operations and sales of timber as may be deemed advisable and provided for by law, $100,000, of which $10,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. I would ask the gentleman how far it is intended under this provision for a Commissioner of Indian Affairs to enter into the business of lumbering.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not intended for lumbering purposes. It is intended for the purpose of preserving the timber.

Mr. MANN. "And to conduct such timber operations and sales of timber as may be deemed advisable and provided for by law." Is it only intended to sell the timber itself?

Mr. SHERMAN. If I may, I will read what the commissioner says in that respect. He says:

I would say generally that it has been the effort of the Indian Bureau ever since I have been in there to try to cooperate with the other big bureaus of the Government, which bureaus the Government is maintaining at its expense, in order to get their particular expert knowledge to help us with reference to the various matters under their charge. The only alternative from that was for us to have a little forestry division and a little irrigation force and a little agricultural force, and so on. In that way we would have all little wheels within wheels, and a much more economical method would be, as we thought, to refer these questions to the different bureaus, and thus effect the same thing by turning the work of the bureaus to the larger ones which have been established by the Government for that purpose. We would simply take our service and place it in the hands of some bureau which had been established for the purpose of handling that particular thing. This method would put the Indian on a basis where, when he became qualified, he would be on the same footing with other citizens, receiving assistance from the same source.

In the case of forest reservations we found that we were continually in hot water over lumbering contracts in the administration of Indian forest lands. We considered, in view of the much more economical way in which that could be handled by a bureau having the proper machinery with which to do it in the fields, by saving in the details and in the expense of getting up the expert knowledge that would otherwise have to be done by the Forest Bureau, which we are now handling in a rather blundering sort of way. In order to do that we would have to increase in a considerable way the expenses of the Forestry Service by getting an increase of this appropriation. By this change we can keep our men on Indian work proper and have the Forest Service do this essential work.

Mr. MANN. It is intended, I take it, to have this work done through the Forestry Service?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is as I understand the commissioner.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That any moneys appropriated in this act for the general incidental expenses of the Indian service in certain States and Territories, including traveling expenses of agents, which are not needed in the particular States or Territories for which provided may be used for the same kind of expenses elsewhere, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that paragraph. Just what is the object in making appropriations for specific States and Territories? It means nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does mean something. In each individual case an appropriation is made about what it is thought is necessary to cover the expenses of that case. Every now and again it will occur that in a particular State quite a portion of the appropriation is not used. In another State it will occur that the full appropriation is not quite adequate to meet the requirements, and it will differ from year to year because of unforeseen exigencies that might arise, and this provision makes possible——

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limitation in the amount——

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not thnk so.

Mr. MANN. It is customary where we provide for transference to say not over 10 per cent, or some per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. These are small appropriations, anyhow, that are for general incidental expenses. It is not a large sum appropriated for gratuities, for support and civilization, and that sort of thing. These are small amounts appropriated for incidental expenses in the several States, and the whole thing together amounts to less than $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

INSPECTORS.

For pay of two Indian inspectors, who shall be engineers, one to be designated as chief, competent in the location, construction, and maintenance of irrigation works, one at $2,500 per annum and one at $3,500 per annum; in all, $6,000. For traveling expenses of two Indian inspectors, at $3 per day when actually employed on duty in the field, exclusive of transportation and sleeping-car fare, in lieu of all other expenses now authorized by law, for incidental expenses of negotiation, inspection, and investigation, including telegraphing and expense of going to and coming from the seat of government, and while remaining there under orders and direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for a period not to exceed twenty days, $3,800.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The bill carries two Indian inspectors as against eight of last year, as I understand the other six are transferred to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. This bill has never provided that these Indian inspectors should be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, although I believe that has been at times, if not always, done, whereas the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, whose absence I regret, the chairman of my beloved Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, a member of the conference committee, has brought into the House a conference report, which, violating all the principles of the civil-service law, proposes to have these six new Indian inspectors, or six new inspectors, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, making them absolutely the patronage of certain distinguished gentlemen, citizens of the United States, holding official positions in this Capitol. When that conference report comes before the House I hope I will have the opportunity to call attention to this violation to what seems to me the proper ethics of the situation, together with some other violations also in the conference report. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

TRUXTON CANYON SCHOOL.

For support and education of 100 pupils at the Indian school at Truxton Canyon, Ariz., and for pay of superintendent, $18,200; General repairs and improvements, $3,000.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Mr. Chairman, at the end of line 6, page 13, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Following what line?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Line 6; I desire to increase the amount. The amendment I suggest is: "Balance due James H. Owen on contract for erecting buildings, etc., $930."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 6, page 13, insert:
"Balance due James H. Owen on contract for erecting buildings, etc., $930."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois was good enough to reserve the point of order. I would be glad for the gentleman from California to give some explanation of his amendment.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. This amendment is for the balance due on a contract for the erection of some buildings by Mr. Owen. In 1906 he erected certain buildings at this school and constructed certain irrigation works there. The contract amounted, I believe, to $23,000 for all this work. In the contract which he took with the schools there was a provision that if the work was not completed within a specified time there should be a penalty of $30 a day for every day over the specified time.

Mr. SHERMAN. May I interrupt the gentleman right there? Is this the contract under which the Indian Office attempted to hold a penalty and found that they were unable to do so?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. That is right; on a technicality.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is this a contract where the Indian Office in a report to the committee states that the man performed his contract in good faith, rendered good service, but that owing to some delay of the railroad he was unable to get his material there in time, and therefore attempted to waive it?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes. The facts are that he was not able to complete his contract within the specified time, for the reason that this was in 1906, when we all know the railroads were glutted with business and it was impossible to deliver goods on time. All the facts show that this contractor did his work faithfully according to contract; that the delay was caused not by his own acts, but it was impossible to avoid. And the Department of the Interior, realizing that he had done his work properly and faithfully, tried to find some way of paying this man, but concluded that technically they could not do it, inasmuch as the $30 a day was considered as liquidated damages, and the department claimed on that technicality that they had no right to waive that provision.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is a penalty for failing to comply with a contract at a certain date?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And the penalty amounts to the sum that the gentleman has stated there? Did the Government collect that amount?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. It retained that amount out of the contract price, and I am asking now that the Government pay this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I had a case of this character. In fencing the forest reserve in the Comanche country there was quite a hard contract made with the individuals who made the contract, and they lost quite a lot of money on it. They put in their claim for reimbursement in the shape of a bill which I introduced for them in this Congress, and it was sent to the Committee on Claims, and I have been unable to get a report thereon. I thought at first that it was on all fours with the claimants' case in my bill, but I find that it is not.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. This bill has been before the Senate, and has passed that body. There is also a bill pending here in the House that has not yet been acted upon. It is a just claim, long since overdue.

Mr. COX of Indiana. What work was this contractor engaged in?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. To erect buildings for this school and to build certain irrigating works connected with the school.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Build a schoolhouse?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I do not know whether it was a schoolhouse or not, but it was some building connected with the school.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the item is subject to a point of order. It seems that under an appropriation the Interior Department advertised for bids for the construction of buildings at this Truxton Canyon school, requiring that the work should be completed by some time—I think the 1st of December of the year in which the advertisement was made, several years ago. The contract was to be some $23,000. It was entered into for that amount, providing for the completion of the work by the date named in the contract—I think December 1, or thereabouts—with the stipulation that $30 liquidated damages, and not as penalty, should be deducted for each day that there was delay. Now, the gentleman claims that delay was made because the railroad did not furnish the material in time, and I have no reason to doubt the claim. If the gentleman had completed his work in time, he probably would have made a very large profit, because it is evident, I think, from the facts in the case, that he has suffered by reason of delay a considerable loss in excess of the $900 which was retained by the Government. So that he took his chances on making a large profit on his contract, or making no profit, or on making a loss. If the gentleman had made a profit he would not have offered to return any of it to the Government.

Now, such cases are familiar. Perhaps under the rules laid down by the Committee on Claims they would allow a case like this. I do not undertake to say. A number of these cases have been reported into the House and a number of them passed, but the rule adopted in reference to such a case should be uniformly applied to all contractors under similar conditions.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman yield? Does not he think that there is a difference in a contract, where time is the essence of the contract, for a building to be completed in a specified time?

Mr. MANN. That is this case. Time was the essence of the contract.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. In what respect was the United States damaged?

Mr. MANN. The United States was damaged in this respect——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You have a quid pro quo for services? The fact that they advertise for bids for this work to be completed within a very limited period of time, much more limited than is usual to take, they knew they had to pay a higher price to get the work done than they would have if they had given more time. Whenever a contractor has a very limited time to complete his job we know he must pay higher prices than when the work is leisurely done. I think the item is subject to the point of order because the auditor and comptroller have ruled that it can not be paid under existing law, and hence there is no authority of law; and I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from California provides for an appropriation to pay what appears to be a claim against the Government. It seems to the Chair it is clearly a deficiency item, and not in order upon the Indian appropriation bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SHERMAN INSTITUTE.

For support and education of 500 Indian pupils at the Sherman Institute, Riverside, Cal., and for pay of superintendent, $86,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 24, strike out the words "five hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred and fifty;" and page 13, line 26, strike out the words "eighty-six thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "ninety-four thousand three hundred and fifty-seven."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an increase in the number of pupils appropriated for at that school by 50. The average number in attendance last year was 577, although but 500 were appropriated for. At this time there are over 600 students, and the students are largely from California. More than half of them are full-blood Indians. It is a very popular school; it could not be otherwise, considering its name, let me say, anticipating the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this rapid increase would keep up as long as it bore the name of the gentleman who so highly honors the school by its having his name?

Mr. SHERMAN. I assume, if I were as modest as the gentleman, I would answer the gentleman untruthfully; but, being truthful as well as modest, I must say it always will. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I hope we will always have plenty of money to keep it up. [Renewed laughter.]

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, yesterday was the eleventh anniversary of the destruction of the Maine in the harbor of Habana. That event made history, wrote a glorious chapter in our annals, and changed the map of the world. More than a decade has now come and gone since that tragic event occurred, and as yet nothing has been done by the Government of the United States to raise the wreck of the Maine, and to bring home and bury, with military honors, in Arlington Cemetery, the remains of the sixty-odd brave and gallant sailors entombed in that hulk in the muck and slime of Habana Harbor.

The records in the Navy Department show that 231 men were killed when the Maine was blown up; that 24 bodies were immediately recovered and buried in Key West, Fla.; that later 144 bodies were recovered and buried in Habana; that these bodies were subsequently brought home and buried in the national cemetery at Arlington; that at least 63 bodies were never recovered or accounted for, and are now entombed in the wreck of the Maine. For some inexplicable reason the Maine has never been raised and these bodies of the nation's heroic dead recovered and brought home for burial. Our dereliction in this matter is little less than a national disgrace. It is becoming a big black blot on our boasted patriotism. Public sentiment has demanded for years that the wreck of the Maine be raised; that the truth of her destruction be told; that the derelict be removed from the channels of commerce; that the bodies of these brave sailors who sacrificed their lives on the altar of their country be recovered and brought home and decently interred in the national cemetery.

Sir, for several years past I have endeavored in every way in my power to have something done about this deplorable matter, but thus far without success. Long ago I introduced a resolution which passed the House unanimously, calling on the Secretary of the Navy for information as to the cause of delay. The Secretary of the Navy sent to the House of Representatives, in compliance with that resolution, some data which was printed as a House document and is now before the Congress. In that document the Secretary of the Navy makes the following statement:

The best information at the command of the Navy Department respecting the probable cost of the removal of the wreck of the Maine and the burial of the dead now lying in the hulk of that vessel, with regard to which inquiry is made in the resolution of the 10th instant, is afforded by an examination of the expenditures actually incurred in the attempt to accomplish those objects and in their partial achievement under the appropriations above cited.

It is a matter of record and tradition that when in February, 1898, this work was undertaken representatives of the wrecking companies visited the Department and suggested that on account of the peculiar circumstances under which the vessel was sunk, the nature of the work, and the conditions existing in the harbor at the time, it would be extremely difficult to name in advance any reasonable lump sum at which the task could be undertaken, or to give assurance that the vessel itself could be raised; and after full conferences it was determined that the work of recovering the bodies entombed in the ship and saving such portions of the armament and equipment as could be reached should be immediately entered upon, provision being at the same time made for the raising of the vessel if found practicable.

I now read in this connection a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the Secretary of State concerning the matter. It is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 4, 1908.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th ultimo inclosing a translation of a note from the Cuban minister inquiring "whether the decision reached by this Government recognizing Cuba's rights in the matter of the wrecks of the Alfonso XII and Maine also applies to the wrecks of all the Spanish war ships destroyed during the war of 1898 in Cuban waters," was duly received.

In reply I have the honor to state that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Shaw, in a letter dated January 9, 1903, said that the Treasury Department did not desire to take further action regarding wrecks in Cuban waters and "was inclined to the opinion that any authority or rights it may have had formerly may properly be considered as having lapsed in favor of the Government of Cuba." (Sec. 3755, R. S.)

On the contrary, however, the Navy Department (letter of July 1, 1902, to Mr. George Richardson, copy herewith, and in other correspondence) has taken the attitude that the disposal of the wreck of the Maine rests with the Congress, and that no Executive Department could give assurance of its abandonment by the United States. With respect to the wreck of the Maine and those of the Spanish war ships destroyed during the war of 1898 in Cuban waters, however, it may be added that the Navy Department is not now engaged in, and has not in contemplation, any work thereupon.

After correspondence on the subject, the Department of State, October 27, 1904, expressed the view that "in order to obtain a valid and effective disposition of the Maine wreck" the matter should appropriately "be settled by a convention with Cuba."

The Navy Department expressed its concurrence in this view; but it is understood that the action thus suggested has not been taken.

Very respectfully,

V. H. METCALF, Secretary.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

That letter and the report of the Secretary of the Navy made it clear to me that legislation was necessary to accomplish the object desired. Hence, on the 20th day of April, 1908, I introduced a bill which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21176) to raise the wreck of the U. S. battle ship Maine in Habana Harbor, and remove the bodies therein to Arlington Cemetery for interment.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to forthwith prepare and publish proposals requesting bids for the removal of the wreck of the U. S. battle ship Maine, now sunk in Habana Harbor, and have the bodies therein brought to Washington for interment in the national cemetery at Arlington; and that the contract or contracts for the purposes herein specified shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder.

SEC. 2. That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to make the necessary arrangements, if any be necessary, for the purposes herein designated, with the Republic of Cuba.

SEC. 3. That any money now at the disposal of the Navy Department is hereby made applicable for the purposes herein specified, and if the same be not sufficient to carry out the purposes herein specified, then such sum of money as may be necessary to meet all the requirements of this act is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, that bill speaks for itself. It is now slumbering in the Committee on Naval Affairs, where it has been pigeon-holed ever since I introduced it. I have done everything in my power to get it reported, but thus far without success. I say now it should be speedily reported and passed ere this session of Congress adjourns. It will accomplish the object desired, and it meets with the approval of the patriotic people of this country. The delay has been disappointing to the friends of the Maine's heroic dead. I proclaim that the Government has been recreant in this matter. But I am not disheartened. I shall keep working for this legislation until the Maine is raised and the bodies of our dead sailors are brought home for interment. The fault is not mine. I have done, and I am trying to do, my duty. The fault is with the Naval Affairs Committee of this House. The members of this committee are to blame for the disgraceful neglect and delay. Yesterday being the eleventh anniversary of this tragical calamity, I tried to get the Speaker to recognize me, it being suspension day in the House, to make a motion to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from further consideration of my bill, and pass the same. The Speaker refused to grant me recognition, although the Speaker recognized other Members on the floor for the purpose of calling up and passing bills far less commendable than my bill to raise the Maine, the enactment of which is demanded by our liberty-loving people from one end of the land to the other.

On the 28th day of January this year the President sent to the House of Representatives a special message in which he urged the Congress to take action in regard to the removal of the Maine from the harbor of Habana. The President says in his special message:

Governor Magoon, on the eve of leaving Cuba, has expressed the hope that the wreck of the battle ship Maine may be removed from the harbor of Habana. I trust the Congress will see the wisdom of this suggestion and will provide for the removal of the Maine. We should not allow the wreck of this historic ship to remain as a possible danger to navigation in Habana Harbor, for this is wise from no standpoint. An appropriation should be made for the removal.

But, sir, nothing is done. The Speaker and the Committee on Naval Affairs, for some inexplicable reason that I can not fathom, refuse to respond to the request of the President based on the statement of Governor Magoon, and neglect to report or act on my bill to remove the wreck of the Maine from the harbor of Habana and bring the remains of our sailors home to the land they loved and died for. What a shame! What a disgrace to America! What an object lesson of our neglect to every man in the navy of which we feel so proud! Let me read you a part of the statement of Governor Magoon made to the Cubans just before he left Habana. Governor Magoon said:

The wreck of the Maine continues to lie in the mud and waters of Habana Harbor. The sunken battle ship is a serious menace to the shipping of the harbor, as it occupies a portion of the best anchorage. The obstruction has increased annually during the last ten years by causing a shoal. The moderate tides prevailing in the harbor are hardly sufficient to prevent a gradual filling up, and this shoal seriously interferes with the action of the tides, and therefore the entire harbor is rapidly filling. It will be necessary in a short time to begin dredging in order to provide proper anchorage for the large amount of shipping now entering the harbor unless the wreck is removed. The anchorage is also restricted by the wreck and the shoal, for ships are obliged to anchor at sufficient distance to prevent grounding in case they strain on their cables.

Even more important than this obstruction to navigation is the fact that this wreck, although it contains the bodies of sixty-three American seamen, or what is left of them, is apparently abandoned and forgotten by the Government and people of the United States. Thousands of Americans and other thousands of other nationalities annually enter the harbor of Habana, and probably not one omits to express regret and censure for the deplorable spectacle. It has become a national reproach and an international scandal.

The neglect to remove the wreck is attributed by many, especially the large Spanish contingent in Cuba, to the fear that its removal will disclose the fallacy of the popular belief that the Maine was destroyed by a torpedo or mine instead of an interior explosion. So generally does this opinion prevail that I believe the Cuban Government was deterred thereby from dealing with the wreck as an obstruction to navigation of its coastal waters and destroying it; however, it should be added that the Cuban authorities were also restrained by a belief that the United States would sometime desire to attempt to remove it and preserve the wreck as a whole instead of breaking it up and removing it in the more inexpensive manner.

The correspondence on file in the Department of State and the Navy Department at Washington shows that a belief prevails in those departments that it is necessary to secure, by a treaty or otherwise, the consent of the Republic of Cuba to the authorities of the United States entering the harbor of Habana and proceeding with the work of removal. This permission, if necessary, can be easily secured, and the Cuban Government would gladly afford assistance in its power to accomplish the desired result, not only because of the injury to the harbor facilities, but also because of the prompting of patriotism and sentiment. I earnestly recommend that the United States Government take immediate steps to accomplish the removal without further delay.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know just why the Committee on Naval Affairs refuses to take action in this matter. I have done my best to get my bill reported. I would like to have some reason for this delay. The patriotic press of the country rings with commendable editorials day in and day out in favor of this legislation. The Government has been derelict in its duty to these brave and gallant men. The Congress must act. The wreck of the Maine must be raised. The bodies of her heroic dead must be brought home. Gratitude commands it. Patriotism demands it. The Maine must be raised. Let us do our plain duty now. Let us be grateful. Let us be patriotic. Let us enact this legislation—lest we forget——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman from New York any data as to what it will cost the United States Government to raise the wreck of the Maine?

Mr. SULZER. I have.

Mr. COX of Indiana. How much do you estimate it will cost?

Mr. SULZER. Less than $50,000 according to competent experts, and I think the Navy Department has available now all the money that is necessary for the purpose—money that was heretofore appropriated. All that is necessary to do now is to pass my bill directing it to be done.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Has the gentleman any data as to the physical value of the Maine after it is raised?

Mr. SULZER. Possibly the old hulk will have no great monetary value save for scrap; but that is not the question. This matter is one of gratitude to those who died for their country—of patriotism—of sentiment—of all that makes a nation grand and great. It rises above the sordid question of dollars and cents. I say there are entombed in the hulk of the Maine the bodies of 63 brave and loyal sailors who died for their country, and the greater value is in the gratitude of the Government for which they offered up their lives; and if we do not do our plain duty in the premises we will be false to ourselves; false to our boasted patriotism; false to the demands of public sentiment now sweeping over the land, which insists that the Congress now legislate to remove the wreck of the Maine and bring these bodies home and bury them with their comrades in Arlington Cemetery. That is the duty of the hour—raise the Maine—lest we forget——

Mr. COX of Indiana. Can these bodies be recovered by diving?

Mr. SULZER. No, they can not. They are buried in the hulk of what is left of the Maine, and the wreck must be removed—raised—to get the bodies; and the old hulk should be removed because it is a menace to navigation, and the Cubans want it out of the way.

Mr. COX of Indiana. And the gentleman says there are still 63 bodies in the wreck of the Maine?

Mr. SULZER. Yes; at least that many, according to official reports.

Now, sir, during the Spanish-American war our battle cry was "Remember the Maine!" Have we forgotten that? Have we, forsooth, so soon forgotten the Maine? Should not every prompting of patriotism impel us not only to remember the Maine, but to raise the Maine? The veterans of the Spanish-American war, from one end of the country to the other, are very much in favor of action along the lines of my bill, and nearly every camp has passed resolutions favoring its speedy enactment into law. Our neglect of the dead sailors buried in the wreck of the Maine is a shame and a disgrace. The wreck of the Maine must be raised. The bodies of our gallant seamen must be brought home and interred with their ill-fated comrades in the national cemetery. Let us do our duty. Let us enact this law. Let us raise the Maine. Let us find out for all time if the Maine was destroyed by an explosion from within or without. Let the truth be known to all the world. I am not afraid of the truth. No true American is afraid of the truth. The raising of the Maine will forever dissipate doubt—forever clear the sky of history—forever be a credit to our heart, and our courage, and our manhood, and our patriotism, and our gratitude to our heroic dead. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print, in connection with my remarks, a few letters and newspaper comments regarding this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The data follow:

PRAISE FOR MR. SULZER—VETERANS INTERESTED IN HIS BILL TO RAISE THE "MAINE"—SENATOR COLBY'S LETTER.

To the Editor of the News.

SIR: Patriotic organizations, together with survivors of the civil and Spanish wars in this State, numbering something over 100,000, are deeply interested in association and individual effort to remove the wreck of the battle ship Maine and her dead to a final resting place under the flag which was honored by "the Maine and her men." Keenly recognizing the conspicuous national indifference and neglect of a decade in the matter of the sunken Maine, a deep sense of national pride and local patriotism have steadily worked together through the public press, and fraternal organizations, to initiate and support Congressional action, which has now taken encouraging shape and promise, in a bill just introduced by Congressman SULZER.

Thousands of survivors of the civil war, both Union and Confederate, congratulate Mr. SULZER for the introduction of this bill, and they stand ready, with a soldier's welcome, for the success of its purpose and provisions. The drift of sentiment, outside of this, may be seen in a letter from a distinguished State senator. It was written by Senator Everett Colby on April 18 last, and sent to Congressman SULZER. The letter follows:

"MY DEAR SIR: I want to add a word to the many you are receiving in favor of the movement to raise the battle ship Maine. Your efforts are indorsed by the veterans of our State, for whom I am glad to speak."

Thanking you in advance for giving space to this, I remain,

Yours, truly,

VETERAN.

WOULD RAISE THE "MAINE"—NEGLECT OF SHIP AND THE NATION'S DEAD UNPARALLELED IN HISTORY OF NAVY.

To the Editor of the News.

SIR: Your valued editorial comment on the recent action of the Secretary of the Navy, in sending to Congress all information in the possession of his Department concerning the wreck of the battle ship Maine and the men who went down with her, is read with interest and appreciation in this State by the majority of those who are identified with patriotic and veteran organizations that was ever moved by an appeal to Congress and national honor in behalf of a famous ship and the nation's dead.

The national indifference to and neglect of the Maine since her "terrible taking off" is unparalleled in the history of our Army and Navy, and the repeated charges that the United States feared to face the facts, such as the wounds of the Maine would disclose, have been publicly charged and reiterated to such an extent that popular sentiment has almost surrendered to feelings akin to the humiliation of an apology to the perpetrator of a crime that shocked the civilized world. In this connection it is recalled that after the Cuban war was over and the details of peace were settled in Paris the Spanish commission said to our representative that "the United States had put a stigma on Spain in charging that Spaniards had wrecked the Maine, and they asked the privilege of raising the battle ship and proving that she was blown up from the inside." However, great credit is due to Congressman WILLIAM SULZER for his untiring efforts, up to and including the passage of his resolution in behalf of the Maine and its dead on the tenth anniversary of her destruction.

Survivors of the civil and Cuban wars, together with the membership of a patriotic organization numbering over 47,000 in New Jersey alone, are enthusiastic spporters of the movement to float the Maine and give proper sepulcher to her honored dead—to have them "brought home to sleep under the Stars and Stripes."

Yours, truly,

A. KING (Veteran 1862–1865).

NEWARK, March 29, 1908.

THE SULZER BILL TO RAISE THE "MAINE."

Representative SULZER, of New York, has introduced a simple and effective measure designed to obliterate a national scandal and disgrace. Mr. SULZER's bill is now in the hands of the House Committee on Naval Affairs. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to contract for raising the wreck of the battle ship Maine and removing the bodies found therein to Arlington Cemetery, to rest hereafter alongside others of the nation's dead. It authorizes and directs the President to make the necessary arrangements for this purpose with the Republic of Cuba.

There should be no partisanship of attitude toward the patriotic, just, decent, and necessary action proposed by Mr. SULZER. The bill represents the common interests and well-nigh unanimous desire of the American people. We are informed that eminent Republicans, as well as Democrats, from this and other States are hastening to assure Mr. SULZER of their approval and support. The sentiment of the veterans, both Union and Confederate, and likewise of the blue and the gray that blended in the Spanish war, is strongly enlisted in the movement.

How could it be otherwise? The thought of those neglected and forgotten bones in Habana Harbor is argument enough. Shall Decoration Day of 1908 pass with the Sulzer bill not yet enacted?

[Editorial from the Albany Argus, March 14, 1908.]

THE WRECK OF THE "MAINE."

Speaking of the resolution offered by Representative WILLIAM SULZER, of this State, asking the Secretary of the Navy to give his opinion to the Congress on the right of the Government of the United States to raise the wreck of the battle ship Maine and clear the harbor of Habana of the obstruction, the Cincinnati Commercial Tribune, in an interesting editorial comment, says:

"It is altogether probable that Congresssman SULZER, with his colleagues of the House, is fully advised of the rights of the United States in the premises. The raising of the wreck might revive the old question of its destruction by connivance or by direct instructions from the Spanish Government, or by an explosion which came from within the Maine and from causes over which the Spanish Government did not and could not control. That the wrecking of the Maine precipitated hostilities is not to be doubted, neither is it to be doubted that hostilities between the two countries were inevitable and would have come about even if the Maine had steamed safely out of the harbor where she never should have been sent. That the explosion was due to connivance or to direct instructions of the Spanish Government is not believed to-day. If the explosion came from the outside, it was the work of Spanish scoundrels determined to bring on the war or the work of hot-headed Cubans who saw in the certainly of war their certainty of independence. But apart from all questions of that nature, the wreck of the Maine should be cleared from Habana Harbor and the causes of the explosion determined if they are possible of determination. It is not altogether creditable that the gallant ship should find burial in foreign waters, and history will not be satisfied without the knowledge of the cause of the explosion. The revival of the question of the cause might be acute for a time, but with all other questions of the war settled the acuteness would neither hurt nor become chronic."

Mr. SULZER'S activity in this matter is very generally commended. It is nothing short of a national disgrace that to-day (more than ten long years after the destruction of the Maine) the hulk of that ill-fated battle ship should still be obstructing the harbor of a friendly city—or an unfriendly one, for that matter—and the bones of those who perished in her be left without decent interment.

Nor does it give a creditable—nor, in our opinion, an accurate—impression of American sentiment to have it said abroad that we as a nation are afraid to raise the Maine for fear it will be proved that the explosion was from within.

The American people are never afraid to do the right thing and to stand for truth, right, and justice. If it was an accidental explosion from the inside which destroyed the Maine, all the world is entitled to the knowledge of the fact, and it would set at rest many ugly rumors and hints made at the time of the explosion and since.

[Editorial from the Washington Post, February 16, 1908.]

ANNIVERSARY OF THE "MAINE"—HABANA DISASTER RECALLED BY RESOLUTION AND HOUSE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER.

With the view to the raising of the ill-fated battle ship Maine and "the proper burial for its dead, now lying with the hulk of that vessel in the harbor of Habana, Cuba," Representative SULZER of New York yesterday introduced in the House a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy for papers and correspondence bearing on the international status of the question and the rights of the Government of the United States in the matter.

Chaplain Couden, in his invocation, recalled the destruction of the Maine, and prayed that war may never visit this country again. After referring to the abiding patriotism of the American people, he said:

"We are reminded of the brave men who, ten years ago to-day, went down to death in the ill-fated Maine. Grant, O God, that their sacrifice may be an inspiration to the living. Make us to know that our country is not only worth living for, but if need be it is worth dying for; that vigilance is not only the price of liberty, but it is the price of everything worth while. Help us, therefore, to be patriots in times of peace as in times of war; but we most fervently pray, O God, that war shall never come to us again, but that we may live in harmony with each other and in peace with all the world."

[Editorial from the New York World, March 26, 1908.]

THE PROJECT TO RAISE THE "MAINE."

Secretary Metcalf, in accordance with the Sulzer resolution, has furnished the House of Representatives with a statement of the work done in recovering the bodies of officers and men lost with the battle ship Maine and in saving equipment and machinery, together with a report on the present status of the project.

The total number of bodies recovered was 188, leaving 63 unaccounted for. A balance of $145,000 remains of the $200,000 appropriated by Congress for the purpose in February, 1898, and $3,000 from the additional appropriation of $10,000 for the removal of the bodies to Arlington Cemetery. Some pieces of armament were saved and the loose wreckage dumped at sea.

What is left is a worthless hulk. But sentiment attaches to it as the tomb of American sailors, and considerations of patriotism urge the raising and removal of the wreck, if only to settle finally the causes of the Maine's destruction. If a convention with Cuba is necessary, it can readily be arranged.

TWIN OAKS, NEWPORT, R. I.,
May 5, 1908.

DEAR SIR: Admiral Luce has sent me your letter to him re raising the Maine. He suggests that as a member of the board of inquiry upon the cause of her loss, that I give you my views in the matter.

I have always held that the ship should be raised and the work be done in a way to allow a thorough examination of her condition as she lies. This would, of course, require the building of a cofferdam which could be pumped out. It should have been done at once after the war. While absolutely sure that the conditions will be found such as described in our report, the question of result should have no bearing in the matter. The board did its duty according to its lights, and I am sure that I can answer for the other surviving members as well as for myself, in saying that we should welcome any new light which exposing the wreck might bring.

Our failure to raise the wreck has undoubtedly given an impression to many of a want of openness and straightforwardness on the part of the Government. It is our duty to remove this. We can afford to say we were mistaken; we can not afford the imputation of fearing the truth.

I am, very truly yours,

F. E. CHADWICK,
Rear-Admiral, Retired.

ARLINGTON, N. J., May 9, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have mentioned the fact that you have decided to speak for the "Maine and her men" in the House to several of my friends who have expressed an interest along the lines of our effort in behalf of the famous wreck and its dead. This information is gratefully accepted by all, many of whom think it most commendable as means to record just what was done from a purely patriotic impulse and sense of honor due the nation and its dead.

If you have not already gotten all the data as to the facts of the Maine when she rode at anchor in Habana Harbor, allow me to say that the ship, as she stood before the explosion, represented an outlay of $5,000,000, according to Captain Sigsbee, her commander. Her machinery cost $735,000. The hull represents tons of steel. The turrets were steel, 8 inches thick, of which there were two, equipped with 10-inch guns. She was protected for a length of 180 feet amidships with Harveyized steel armor 12 inches thick, worth $500 a ton. Her entire equipment was all that is represented by a first-class battleship of her class at the time. We shall look with interest for all that you may say of the Maine.

Yours,

ALFRED KING.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF NEW JERSEY,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Rutherford, N. J., December 26, 1907.

Mr. ALFRED KING, Arlington, N. J.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just learned of your correspondence with Q. M. Gen. Charles Burrows, Grand Army of the Republic, in regard to bringing the question of floating the old battle ship Maine, now lying in the harbor of Habana, to the attention of Congress during its present session. The greatest indifference and neglect seems to be the rule in connection with this famous wreck, and it is certainly commendable on the part of the survivors of the Union armies to ask for national legislation in behalf of the Maine. In this connection I desire to say in our own behalf that the Spanish War Veterans are deeply interested, and peculiarly so, in the fate or removal of the wreck of the U. S. battle ship Maine from Cuban waters, and also that we are in hearty accord with this movement or any other that your efforts may adopt to give the hulk, with its honored dead, an appropriate and final resting place under the flag of our country.

Fraternally, yours,

JOHN T. COLLINS,
Department Commander.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Through the public press and private correspondence of those who are taking a personal interest in raising the old battle ship Maine, I learn of your past and continued efforts in Washington in behalf of the survivors of the civil and Spanish wars, who are taking a deep interest in floating this famous wreck and giving proper burial to its dead. I desire to say in this connection, as an ex-soldier of the Spanish war, that your efforts to float the remains of this battle ship has the support and best wishes of all who are glad to be recognized as comrades and ex-soldiers of the war with Spain for the freedom of Cuba.

Sincerely, yours,

FRANK KOCH.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 5, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER.

SIR: It was a source of pleasure to me to read of your bill in Congress to have raised the battle ship Maine, now lying in Habana Bay. This has been my hope and desire since the destruction of the battle ship on February 15, 1898, and I am sure in that bill you voiced the sentiments of the whole American people. My son, Edward F. Kean, was on duty as a marine guard that night, as I understand, in the lower cabins, and is still among the missing, as also another Chicago boy named Shillington. I trust you will keep the matter of the raising of the battle ship before this honorable session so the work will not be delayed more than is necessary, and, thanking you for your kindly and true American spirit, I remain,

Respectfully,

Mrs. MARGARET KEAN,

15 FRANCIS STREET, NEWPORT, R. I.,

Hon. WM. SULZER, M. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your very polite favor of 16th, I beg to say that if my letter to you urging favorable consideration of the plan for the raising of the Maine can be of the slightest use, please make such disposition of it as you think proper. I trust with all my heart you will not let the matter drop.

Very truly, yours,

S. B. LUCE.

READY FOR MEMORIAL—PREPARATIONS COMPLETE FOR REMEMBERING THE "MAINE"—MAY HAVE NAVY-YARD SALUTE—MANY FLORAL DECORATIONS RECEIVED, WHICH WILL BE PLACED UPON THE ANCHOR IN ARLINGTON NATIONAL CEMETERY—SHORT PROGRAMME THERE, AND PRINCIPAL EVENT IN CHURCH IN THE EVENING.

The final meeting of the committee of arrangements of the Maine Memorial Association and the Army and Navy Union to close up the details for the observance of to-day as the eleventh anniversary of the sinking of the battle ship Maine was held in the parlors of the Portner yesterday afternoon. There will be three features of the day and possibly four. There will be a military mass celebrated at St. Patrick's Catholic Church this morning at 10 o'clock, a pilgrimage to Arlington Cemetery to dedicate the anchor of the Maine in that cemetery, and a memorial service at the First Presbyterian Church, John Marshall place, at 8 o'clock to-night. The fourth feature will be the firing of a national salute at the navy-yard, if the request for such a salute forwarded the President yesterday is complied with.

The military mass will be celebrated by Father McGuigan, assisted by Fathers Carroll and Smyth as deacon and subdeacon. Following the mass Dr. W. T. Russell, rector of St. Patrick's, will deliver a short address.

PILGRIMAGE TO ARLINGTON.

The pilgrimage to Arlington will start from Aqueduct Bridge promptly at 2.30 o'clock, no matter what the condition of the weather may be. It will be made up of men and women from all the patriotic organizations of the District. Two wreaths sent by President Roosevelt will be among the floral tributes placed on the anchor by Mrs. C. Walton Dunlap and Mrs. Mary V. Goundie. It was arranged at yesterday's meeting that a detachment of uniformed men from the gunners' class, headed by Albert Osenger, will assist at the military mass and place a floral offering on the Maine's anchor. The wreath will be entwined with American, Cuban, and Spanish flags. An offering comes from the Mary A. Babcock Auxiliary and Admiral George Dewey Auxiliary, United Spanish War Veterans. Mrs. Ada M. Galloway, in the name of the National Auxiliary of the United Spanish War Veterans, will place a large sheaf of American Beauties on the anchor. Mrs. I. W. Ball, for the National Woman's Relief Corps, will place a wreath on the anchor. The orations at the anchor in Arlington will be by Father Eugene A. Hannan, the Rev. Zed H. Copp, and Maj. Frank A. Butts. Gen. A. S. Burt will preside, and Capt. J. J. Strain will be officer of the day. Two troops of mounted men from Fort Myer will fire the salute, a bugler will sound "taps," and the military band from that post will play the dirge music. The weather permitting, Admiral Sigsbee will be present and make a short address. Admirals Dewey and Schley have been asked to attend the services in Arlington. Two hundred and sixty-six men lost their lives on the Maine, 198 bodies were recovered, and 68 bodies lie in the hulk of the ship. The recovered bodies were buried in Arlington, with a few exceptions.

SERVICES AT THE CHURCH.

The memorial services proper will be held to-night, commencing at 8 o'clock, in the First Presbyterian Church, John Marshall place. General Burt and Col. Charles M. Shinn will preside. The interior of the church will be elaborately decorated with flags and flowers, and the large model of the battle ship Maine in the Pension Office will be among the decorations on the altar. When Admiral Sigsbee enters the church he will be met by a drummer boy, who will sound the admiral's roll and lead the way up the main aisle, followed by color bearers. There will be an elaborate musical programme.

AN APPEAL FOR THE "MAINE"—STATE COUNCIL OF THE JUNIOR ORDER UNITED AMERICAN MECHANICS SENDS RESOLUTIONS TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

To the Editor of the News.

SIR: Survivors of both sides of the civil war and every patriotic American will be glad to learn that the State Council of New Jersey, Junior Order United American Mechanics, representing over 47,000 members in the State of New Jersey alone, will include in the published report of its recent session at Trenton the following preamble and resolutions as an appeal from all councils to President Roosevelt in behalf of the wreck of the battle ship Maine:

"Whereas the wreck of the U. S. battle ship Maine, now lying in the harbor of Habana, Cuba, together with scores (74) of her dead entombed in the hulk are, and have been, the object of material neglect and indifference, unparalleled in the annals of our army and navy: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the State Council of New Jersey, Junior Order United American Mechanics, hereby respectfully requests the President to include in his recommendations to our next National Congress such measures as may be deemed most practical and effective for the early removal of the battle ship Maine from Habana Harbor, and for the proper sepulture of her dead under the flag of our country for which they died; and, be it further

"Resolved, That the recording secretary of this council be, and is hereby, ordered to send a copy of these resolutions, under the seal of the council, to the President at Washington."

These resolutions are signed by Frank R. Sharp, State councilor.

Yours, truly,

VETERAN 1862–05.

TRENTON, November 4, 1907.

[Editorial from the New York Sun, Wednesday, April 8, 1908.]

THE WRECK OF THE MAINE.

If we do not err about the temper of the House of Representatives, an appropriation will soon be made to raise the unsightly and melancholy wreck of the battle ship Maine in the harbor of Habana after almost ten years of neglect and vacillation. Mr. SULZER'S amended resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to send to the House "all letters and data as to the cost and legal status under which the Congress may exercise immediate or future action for the removal of the wreck," and provide burial for the unrecovered dead, was adopted on March 10, and on March 25 Mr. Metcalf complied. His report was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs the following day.

There was at first no disposition to disregard an obvious duty. Eight days after the blowing up of the Maine, which occurred on the evening of February 15, 1898, Congress appropriated $200,000 to recover the remains of the dead, raise the ship, and save any parts of the machinery and equipment that might be used again. On March 30 the sum of $10,000 was appropriated "for the removal of remains of officers and men who perished by the destruction of the U. S. S. Maine." A wrecking and a towing company contracted to do the work. It was abandoned on April 2, 1898, after a report had been made by a naval board recommending that because the contractors were "disinclined to work during the rainy season" and it would take from six to eight months to raise the shattered hull, it was advisable to suspend operations. Meanwhile the court of inquiry had taken evidence and reported, on March 21, that the Maine had been wrecked by the explosion of a mine "under the bottom of the ship at about frame 18 and somewhat on the shore side of the ship." On April 20 President McKinley signed the joint resolution of Congress declaring war upon Spain.

Of the original appropriation of $200,000 the sum of $54,043.94 was expended in stripping the wreck above water and recovering four 6-inch guns, the paymaster's safe, two 6-pounder guns, two searchlights, a steam cutter, the breech mechanism of the after 10-inch guns, and 100 shells. The naval board estimated the value of material which could be recovered if the ship were raised "in good order" at $670,600. It was the judgment of the board that "the machinery would not suffer from being submerged several months." It went on record (March 28, 1898), with the opinion that it had "no doubt of the ability of a good company to do such work." Of the appropriation of $10,000 for the transfer of dead to the United States and their burial at Arlington, $6,968.72 was expended. One hundred and eighty-eight bodies were recovered and buried and sixty-three were "not found."

Among the documents in the case sent by Secretary Metcalf to the House is a statement of the date of May 16, 1902, by Charles E. Magoon, who is now the Provisional Governor of Cuba, and at that time was acting chief in the division of insular affairs, War Department. Mr. Magoon wrote in response to an inquiry:

"The military government of Cuba will take no further steps in regard to the Maine, and after the withdrawal of our military forces from Cuba, unless Congress should otherwise provide, any attempt made by this Government to raise the Maine will come within the jurisdiction of the Navy Department."

The Navy Department has steadily maintained (to quote Mr. Metcalf) "that no executive department of the Government has authority to dispose of or to abandon the wreck, but that such power rests solely, so far as this Government is concerned, in the Congress." In one instance, when the Hon. William H. Moody was Secretary of the Navy, the department (December 3, 1902) disapproved emphatically of Senate bill 5806 "for raising the wreck of the battle ship Maine."

"The department does not regard with favor the raising of the Maine for the purpose of photographing her with the view of entering upon another investigation as to the cause of her destruction. No reason is perceived why the former investigation is not sufficient. The material of the vessel would not be of value to the Navy Department. The sentimental consideration attached to the raising of the Maine appeals to all, but the department does not recommend the passage of the bill."

Earlier in 1902 Representative ROBERTS of Massachusetts had introduced a bill "for raising the wreck of the battle ship Maine," and Acting Secretary Darling, on behalf of the department, wrote to Chairman Foss of the House Naval Committee that "no objection is perceived to the passage of the measure." Six months later, when Chairman HALE of the Senate Naval Committee consulted Mr. Moody about a Senate bill, the Secretary overruled his assistant.

In view of the fact that Cuba is now ruled by a provisional governor, with army officers governing the provinces and an advisory law commission, presided over by Col. E. H. Crowder, U. S. Army, making the laws, the meetings of congress having been suspended by decree of Secretary Taft—in view of these conditions an opinion given by Secretary of State Hay to the Secretary of the Navy on October 8, 1904, is interesting:

"It might be advisable, in order to obtain a valid and effective disposition of the Maine wreck, that the matter be settled by a convention with Cuba, which could be submitted to the Senate of the United States for its concurrence."

Mr. Paul Morton, then Secretary of the Navy, concurred. Cuba is no longer in a position to enter into a subvention on the subject. Her right to do so has been suspended. It is renewable at the pleasure of the United States, and the time of the renewal has not been definitely determined. There can be no doubt that the Cuban people would like to have the wreck of the Maine removed, for the reason, if for no other, that it is an obstruction to navigation. To the American people it is an eyesore when they see it and a heartache when they think about it. Their Government now has the power, if it has the will, to remove the wreck of the Maine without having to ask the permission of Cuba, which would not be withheld if Cuba were articulate politically.

There is no longer any excuse for not raising the Maine. The American people desire that it be done. Let Congress make the appropriation and direct the President to execute the will of the people.

[From the New York Times, April 14, 1908.]

THE MYSTERY OF THE "MAINE."

As long as the Maine stays where it is now, just showing above the unsavory waters of Habana Harbor, there will probably be people to greet every proposition in or out of Congress for raising the vessel with the prophecy that if this ever is done their belief that it was sunk by an interior explosion will be confirmed. Now, as a matter of fact, even the most malignant of these prophets have no such belief; they simply remember that for a while they had suspicions—perhaps "hopes" would be the better word—that such was the case, and their minds are so constructed that these suspicions or hopes have survived the presentation by the Board of Inquiry of evidence absolutely proving that the Maine was blown up from the outside.

Even admitting what these strange persons are so fond of asserting, that the board's report was a tissue of lies and suppressions, they still have to ignore the fact that to this day the keel of the Maine mutely testifies against the interior explosion theory by protruding above the decks through which it was driven by the force of the submerged mine. Even that apparently impossible task they perform offhand, however, and maunder on endlessly about how strange it is if there was a mine that no fragments of it were ever found—how remarkable that if a Spaniard or Cuban pressed the key that set off the mine his identity has never been discovered.

It is nothing to the upholders of the interior explosion theory that when the wreck was first examined large quantities of unburned powder were found in the holds, and nothing to them that all their talk about the deterioration of modern ammunition with age and its consequent tendency toward spontaneous ignition is made absurd by the circumstance that on board the Maine there was not a pound of the kind of powder to which they refer. There is, indeed, still a "mystery of the Maine," but it is the mystery how anybody can now affect a doubt as to the method of her destruction. That was settled for good and all over nine years ago, and, beyond clearing Habana Harbor of a troublesome obstruction, nothing would or could be accomplished by raising the wreck, except, perhaps, a needless confirmation of what is already known.

Women are often charged with a large capacity for disputing the indisputable, and for arguing anew questions that have been argued out, but this is not a sex peculiarity, unless it be true that the men who show it are not men at all. The ever-recurring chatter that comes from some of them about the Maine is enough to make one think so.

"REMEMBER THE MAINE."

ALFRED KING COMMENDS A NEWS EDITORIAL ON NATION'S NEGLECT.

To the Editor of the News:

SIR: Your excellent editorial on "The Maine" deserves all that popular recognition can give as an appeal, in cold logic, from the American people for humane consistency. Every survivor, North and South, of both armies of the civil war is keenly sensible to the fact that hostilities with Spain were urged and recognized by the civilized world in response to the pathetic demands of humanity for the cessation of shocking cruelties in the name of war on the island of Cuba.

As a nation we went to the rescue, affording relief and protection forever under our flag, and the humiliation for a decade of unparalleled national neglect of scores of those who died to save a people from extermination, and that Cuba might be free. It seems to me that in this connection the following poem, "Remember the Maine," written by W. J. Lampton, is worth reprinting:

Down in that tropic, torpid bay,
In the slime and filth of the Spanish way,
Shall the hulk of the Maine forever stay?
Shall the ship that stood for Freedom rot
In the stench of that unhallowed spot?
No, No! Let the people rise as one
With a firm demand that right be done
And the dead be honored—the dead who died
That Liberty should be satisfied.
Take the old ship out of her filthy grave
To the clear, blue sea and the whitecapped wave,
And there in the depths, serene and pure,
Give her a glory sepulture.
And moor above her the flag that waves
Forever above all our heroes' graves.

Yours, truly,

ALFRED KING.

REMEMBERING THE "MAINE."

Services of one sort and another are being held in Washington to-day commemorative of the destruction of the Maine in Habana Harbor on February 15, 1898. It is befitting that the eleventh anniversary of that fateful disaster should be so observed, and at the National Capital, too. We learn from the Washington dispatches that the memorial service may be said to have begun yesterday with an appropriate sermon in one of the Capital's churches to veterans of the Spanish war, to be continued to-day with exercises at Arlington Cemetery around the Maine Monument, a memorial mass in St. Patrick's Church, and an address this evening by Rear-Admiral Sigsbee, who was captain on the Maine when the battle ship was blown up. As we read about this we feel that it is proper and right for memories of the Maine thus to express themselves at Washington, the capital of the Nation.

It is different at the nation's Capitol. Congress does not remember the Maine. Individual members of the Congress do, and have tried to stir the recollection of their fellows, but vainly. The wreck of the Maine, from which the bodies of some three score of our sailors who went down with it were never recovered, has lain in the mud and slime of Habana Harbor for eleven long years, and still lies there, a monument to congressional neglect and oblivion.

There are of course no votes in appropriating money to be spent in Habana Harbor in raising the Maine. Perhaps if there were the collective memory of Congress would not be so short.

[Editorial from The Times, January 27, 1909.]

MR. SULZER'S TRIUMPH.

At last Congress is thinking about raising the wreck of the Maine in Habana Harbor. That the sunken vessel was not raised years ago is a disgrace, and the only public official who can truthfully say that he has a clear conscience in the matter is WILLIAM SULZER, who introduced bill after bill in one session after another to bring the Maine to the surface and take out the bodies of the brave Americans who went down with her.

Mr. SULZER fought vainly for years, and his reward will come, for the American people will always remember that he led the small force of Congressmen who sought to have a wrong righted, and who are now on the verge of seeing their efforts crowned with success.

[Editorial from the North American, Philadelphia, Friday, January 29, 1909.]

THE FORGOTTEN "MAINE."

Down in the harbor of Habana on Wednesday morning there was a ceremony which did honor to some of the poorly paid servants of this nation, but which made darker this nation's black shame.

The common seamen of the United States battle ship Maine scraped their pennies together and, with the $150 so collected from the forecastle, they bought wreaths and garlands and clustered flowers and a new American flag.

And with launches laden with those purchases, accompanied by Captain Caperton and other officers who wished thus to show their approval of the enlisted men's sentiment, the sailors crossed the harbor from the new Maine's anchorage to the spot where a tangled, twisted, rusted mass of metal, not yet sunken into the mud, that is the coffin of sixty-three Americans who gave their lives for the flag, marks the spot where the old Maine anchored eleven years ago.

It was a silent trip, and the work that followed was done in silence. Half-masted and reversed—the signal of distress—the Stars and Stripes were hoisted on the military mast which still protrudes above the water, reminding every foreigner who sees the coast of Cuba that we have not remembered the Maine.

There was no silly speech making. The oratory of those hard-bitten, hard-handed, hard-living, and hard-fighting sailors is of deeds, not spoken words.

All that they did was to hide with blossoms and green garlands every vestige of that rusted, neglected sepulcher of our forgotten dead and, after a silent salute to the wreck and the flag, to journey back in silence from the Maine of 1898 to the Maine of 1908.

Of course, a subscription of $150 is not a thing to make a stir about, even when it comes from men whose pay ranges from $16 to $70 a month. But those men on the Maine can hardly be considered cheap men. That sum happened to be all they had left. Because when they heard of the death and suffering in Sicily and Calabria they "chipped in" all they could spare to swell their officers' contribution to the relief fund for Italy and so made possible a wireless message that one American battle ship alone had added $1,000 to the life-saving work on the other side of the world.

So the sailors had not much money left to buy flowers with. They could buy only enough to cover that wreckage in Habana harbor. Yet we do not think they are cheap men, even though all the hundreds of them could put into the cap passed around only a pitiful $150.

Our sorrow is that we can not disclaim cheapness as a stigma which any foreign critic is entitled to put upon this rich nation.

"Remember the Maine!" Do not all of us remember how the signal that Dewey flew when, like Farragut, he said: "Damn the torpedoes!" and sped into Manila bay, first made us storm, then settle into fixed wrath, and finally indulge in stern exultation?

"Remember the Maine!" And for eleven years 63 of our dead have been settling slowly with their ship deeper and ever deeper into the mud of that harbor bed.

In the hour of our highest pride and strength and boasting there never will be need for a poet to write a "Recessional" for America. In bitterness and sadness let us confess that the message for our self-study is not "Lest we forget," but "We have forgotten."

Certain material truths we consider of comparative unimportance. We have freed Cuba, and have done our best to uplift her to independence. Yet we leave her with "the sunken battle ship a serious menace to the shipping of the harbor, as it occupies a portion of the best anchorage. The obstruction has increased annually during the last ten years by causing a shoal. It will be necessary in a short time to begin dredging, in order to provide proper anchorage for the large amount of shipping now entering the harbor unless the wreck is removed."

We leave that wreckage not only an obstacle at Cuba's doorway, but a standing scandal upon this nation and a slander upon the American navy. For it is only too true that "the neglect to remove the wreck is attributed by many, especially the large Spanish contingent in Cuba, to the fear that its removal will disclose the fallacy of the popular belief that the Maine was destroyed by a torpedo or mine instead of an interior explosion. So generally does this opinion prevail that the Cuban government was deterred thereby from dealing with the wreck as an obstruction to navigation of its coastal waters and destroying it."

These reasons, cited by Charles E. Magoon, provisional governor of Cuba, in his annual report, forwarded to the War Department, are forceful and sufficient. Emphasized by a special message of the President, pleading with Congress to "see the wisdom" of Governor Magoon's suggestion for the removal of the wreck should bring even from this Congress the small appropriation needed for the work.

But it is in the following passage of the Magoon report that we find the stinging indictment of American patriotism and national decency that should stir the country to self-respect and elicit a mandate to Congress jarring the unspeakable pettiness of its ruffled "dignity" to realization of what the nation's dignity demands:

"Even more important than this obstruction to navigation is the fact that this wreck, although it contains the bodies of 63 American seamen, or what is left of them, is apparently abandoned and forgotten by the Government and people of the United States. Thousands of Americans and other thousands of other nationalities annually enter the harbor of Habana, and probably not one omits to express regret and censure for the deplorable spectacle. It has become a national reproach and an international scandal."

Fair men did not quarrel with the greatest living poet when he called the American spirit "uncouth, illogical, elate." But the sense of injustice was keen when he proclaimed us "careless 'mid his dead, the scandal of the elder earth."

How can we declare that taunt untrue, how can we cleanse our honor as a people, while the skeletons that were our heroes only eleven years ago lie in their rotting uniforms in that harbor slime, unremembered and unhonored save by those poor wreaths hung on the wreckage by grace of the pennies of a few sailors ready to face the same death any day for the sake of the same reward from the country that is the richest of all on earth—save in remembrance and self-respect?

The Clerk read as follows:

COLORADO.

For general incidental expenses of the Indian Service in Colorado, including traveling expenses of agents, $1,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to follow line 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 14 "the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of and convey the real estate, including buildings and fixtures of the Grand Junction and Fort Lewis schools, Colorado, to the State of Colorado upon the condition that the properties shall continue to be maintained and operated as educational institutions, and that children of Indian parents shall have the same privileges of education as white children, with tuition free: Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and directed to dispose of by sale or transfer to other schools such property as is not covered by the transfer of the real estate, buildings, and fixtures."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think any point of order would lie against it.

Mr. MANN. The transfer of property of the United States to a State is subject to a point of order; whether it does or not is a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the question here; we want to get at whether it is advisable to do it or not.

Mr. MANN. I do not doubt the advisability of doing it on proper terms. I wish the gentleman would explain the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. A special report was made to the House in Document No. 1071, in which it is stated, among other things, that, so far as the Fort Lewis and Grand Junction schools of Colorado are concerned, Governor Buchtel answered the inquiry sent out by the department that he was quite certain that the State could use one or both of these properties as normal schools, that they were very much needed, and he would take up the subject with the government officials.

The commissioner stated to us later—I supposed it was in this report—that negotiations had been taken up with the State of Colorado and the State was anxious to obtain the title to these two schools, with the agreement that they should be maintained in perpetuity as schools and that in these schools any Indian pupils should be educated and cared for at the expense of the State of Colorado. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

KANSAS.

HASKELL INSTITUTE.

For support and education of 750 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans., for transportation of pupils to and from said school, and for pay of superintendent, $137,750; for general repairs and improvements, $10,000; for hay barn, $3,000; for equipment new manual-training building, $1,000; for ventilation system, $2,500; for equipment of manual training school, $2,500. In all, $156,750.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 6 and 7 on page 17. It is a duplication.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MORRIS SCHOOL.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to dispose of and convey the real estate, including buildings and fixtures, of the Morris School of Minnesota, in the State of Minnesota, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, including the necessary land therefor: Provided, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and directed to dispose of by sale or transfer to other schools such property as is not covered by the transfer of the realty, buildings, and fixtures.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. What I said in reference to the Colorado schools applies to this.

Mr. MANN. This school has not been in existence a great while, has it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Something like thirteen years, I think; I may be in error.

Mr. MANN. Is there any possibility of our providing some other schools to take the place of these after we give them away?

Mr. SHERMAN. The thought is in the disposition of these schools to dispose of those remote from reservations; to dispose of those which have not a sufficient number of pupils to make it worth while and expedient to maintain the schools. That is, that have not enough pupils within the reasonable radius of the school; at the same time to provide, in the disposal of them, that there shall be free tuition for the Indians at that school, and to dispose of them to States upon the proviso that they shall maintain them as educational institutions.

Mr. MANN. There is no such provision in this paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. We did not put it in the bill, but we authorize the department to dispose of it upon those conditions.

Mr. MANN. But it was in the gentleman's other amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no thought of disposing of the schools other than to provide for free tuition for such Indians as present themselves for schooling.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman and I agree about the advisability of maintaining the nonreservation schools, although the gentleman would hardly be understood as insisting that they were disposing of schools far away from the reservation first.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there are other considerations than that. For instance, in what is known as the Haskell School in Kansas, a most excellent school with a manual training department; there is no better school anywhere, and still that school is more remote from large numbers of Indians than other schools that we would sooner dispose of. There is no better school anywhere or one which furnishes a better education than the Haskell School.

Mr. MANN. There are a large number of Indians in Minnesota. Are we going to get ourselves into the position in giving away the present school that in a year or two we will be asked by gentlemen who represent the State of Minnesota to provide another school up there, and possibly some more complaisant chairman, not so long in the service as the gentleman from New York, will agree to provide the additional school.

Mr. SHERMAN. I anticipate that within the service of the gentleman from Illinois—and I trust that will be as long as it has been valuable, and that makes it almost perpetual—I doubt if anybody within that length of time will undertake to establish a new nonreservation school in this country.

Mr. MANN. Oh, they have been established since I have been here. There are many more ways than one of killing a cat.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, nobody knows that better than the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to complete the survey, allotment, classification, and appraisement of the lands in the Blackfeet Reservation, in the State of Montana, $100,000: Provided, That this sum shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds of the sale of the surplus lands after the allotments are made.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I would ask the gentleman how much of a reservation this is.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not as large as the Crow Reservation. I wonder if the gentleman from Montana [Mr. PRAY] can tell me from memory.

Mr. PRAY. About 1,800,000 acres.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is larger than I had supposed.

Mr. MANN. After this survey is made, will that be followed up by a bill to open it up for entry?

Mr. PRAY. That is for an irrigation project, and this is to continue that—this appropriation. About 30,000 acres of it will be available for irrigation.

The Clerk read as follows:

For construction of irrigation systems to irrigate the allotted lands of the Indians of the Flathead Reservation, in Montana, and the unallotted irrigable lands to be disposed of under the act of April 23, 1904, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," including the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, $250,000, the cost of said entire work to be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sale of the lands within said reservation.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, line 21, at the end of the paragraph, after the word "reservation," amend by inserting the following as a new paragraph:

"That any of the lands withdrawn under the reclamation act in pursuance of the provisions of section 5 of the act of Congress approved April 27, 1904, entitled 'An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation, in Montana, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect,' which are not disposed of within five years from the date of the passage of said act shall remain subject to disposal under the provisions of the reclamation act until otherwise directed by the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. SHERMAN. On that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MANN. What is the number of the gentleman's bill?

Mr. PRAY. Senate 8357. It was reported by the Indian Committee a few days ago. I will state that the purpose of this amendment is simply to enable the Reclamation Service to retain control of the disposition of the balance of the lands now remaining under the Huntley irrigation project. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs will recollect that a few years ago a portion of the Crow Indian Reservation was ceded to the United States, and that about 30,000 acres were withdrawn under the reclamation act for the purpose of building an irrigation project about 12 miles from Billings, Mont. This project was constructed at an expense of about a million dollars. It was provided in the act opening this portion of the reservation that all lands not disposed of within five years—that is, five years from the 27th of April, 1904, when the act took effect——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. When do the five years expire?

Mr. PRAY. April 27, 1900. That the balance of the land would be sold to the highest bidder for cash, as appears from the Senate report. That would enable speculators to come in and take up the balance of the lands under the Huntley project and defeat the purpose of the reclamation act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The purpose of this amendment is to extend the time?

Mr. PRAY. It is to extend the time and enable the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of them as was originally intended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then it would be a benefit to the Indians, inasmuch as it would bring them more money, and there would be a chance to get a better price for the land.

Mr. PRAY. Yes; I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it would be a good amendment.

Mr. PRAY. The Indians receive $4 an acre.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this amendment be not adopted, then what will be the result? Will not this land be sold to the highest bidder?

Mr. PRAY. If this amendment is not adopted, and I am not fortunate enough in passing the bill before the end of the session, it will be sold to the highest bidder and speculators will be enabled to get control of these valuable lands, and I would say to the gentleman that three-quarters of the land under the Huntley irrigation project, consisting of about 30,000 acres, are now settled, and the service desires to go ahead and carry out the purposes of the act.

Mr. MANN. If these lands are so extremely valuable and settlers want them, why haven't the settlers taken them within the five years' time?

Mr. PRAY. The gentleman will understand that it took considerable time to complete an irrigation project costing a million dollars. In fact it was only completed about a year and a half ago, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. MANN. Plenty of time within which to settle it. Why should we provide this land should be disposed of for a less price than these Indians would otherwise obtain, if the law now in force is continued in force?

Mr. PRAY. I will say to the gentleman that under the provisions of the original act opening this portion of the Crow Reservation about 30,000 acres were withdrawn, and it was provided by treaty agreement and by statute that the Indians should receive $4 an acre for that land, which would amount to about $120,000; and in addition to that, other valuable considerations specified in the original act, and that the land should be reclaimed under the provisions of the reclamation act——

Mr. MANN. Which land?

Mr. PRAY. The land under the Huntley irrigation project.

Mr. MANN. Now, I will say to the gentleman I have read the report in this case, and nobody can understand what it means. It purports to be a copy of the Senate report, possibly incorrectly copied or incorrectly printed in the first place. This is what the report says:

> All lands which were not disposed of within five years from the date of the passage of said act remain subject to disposal under the provisions of the reclamation act.

Now, if that is the case, if all lands undisposed of within five years remain subject to disposal under the reclamation act, what more does the gentleman want?

Mr. PRAY. Well, aside from the language, which is clearly an error, that is what the bill seeks to accomplish.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but here is a report stating that this is existing law.

Mr. PRAY. I do not know as to that. What report is it?

Mr. MANN. The House report.

Mr. PRAY. I have before me the Senate report——

Mr. MANN. This is the House report. I am reading from the House report purporting to give the Senate report.

Mr. PRAY. The same words are here in the Senate report. I should say that is evidently an oversight or a clerical error.

Mr. MANN. I could not understand, and I do not yet. I assume that that possibly was an error because, otherwise, the bill would not be here, yet there is a statement.

Mr. PRAY. Perhaps I did not quite understand the former question of the gentleman or did not explain it fully in my reply.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether——

Mr. PRAY. I mean the former question.

Mr. MANN. I am trying to ascertain now whether that statement is correct. The gentleman says that statement is incorrect.

Mr. PRAY. I have tried to explain what the bill seeks to accomplish; that is evidently an error in the report.

Mr. MANN. Then the report says that if this bill be not passed and the five-year period expires, then the land will be sold to the highest bidder for cash. Is that correct?

Mr. PRAY. Yes; according to the bill and report that is correct.

Mr. MANN. Why should not that be done? Why should not the Indians have the land sold to the highest bidder for cash? The homesteaders have had a chance to take it up and have not taken it up.

Mr. PRAY. They are taking it up as rapidly as circumstances will permit; they are building up a prosperous community.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that after five years if it has not been taken that nobody has a license to complain.

Mr. PRAY. It seems to me, if the gentleman will permit, that the very purpose of the reclamation act, and likewise the original act, would be absolutely defeated if that were allowed to be done, because one man or set of men might go in there and gain possession of the entire tract; and yet, assuming that was not the intention——

Mr. MANN. I would not assume that would be the case. Of course I am not in favor of speculators getting this land, but the gentleman assumes speculators would get this land. It seems to me this is a distinction between the existing law and what would be the law if the gentleman's bill prevails; that now the homesteader gets this land, and the amount that he pays is restricted to the amount set forth in the law at $4 per acre, whereas much of this land is worth $25 an acre or more; and if the law is continued as it is now, a man could go there and buy this land, this valuable land, paying the Indians what it is worth instead of getting it for "a song and dance."

Mr. McGUIRE. But it does not go to the Indians——

Mr. PRAY. I will say to the gentleman that he is hardly——

Mr. MANN. Then who gets the money for this land if it does not go to the Indians?

Mr. PRAY. It is provided that the Indians shall receive $4 an acre for their land——

Mr. MANN. Not less than $4.

Mr. PRAY. The law says the price shall be $4. Now, the settler has to pay $30 in addition to that on account of the money expended for the construction of——

Mr. MANN. The Indians are to receive not less than $4 per acre for the land, and if they sell for $100 an acre it is their land and it is their money. Now, the Government does not own this land, but it is making improvements, and it is supposed to pay for the improvements out of the money for which the land is sold. Now, I do not see any reason why the Government, although desirous of having homesteaders settle upon this land, should give favoritism to some particular man who wants to settle, at the expense of the Indians.

Mr. PRAY. Well, I do not look at it in that way.

Mr. McGUIRE. Has not that always been the policy of the Government?

Mr. MANN. Quite the contrary; that has not been the policy of the Government.

Mr. McGUIRE. I do not so understand it. It has always been the policy of the Government to allow homesteaders to take up lands throughout the West in general.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself had a bill here the other day, with a plea under which he shed tears almost in the House——

Mr. McGUIRE. Not that.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Stating that the lands had been sold to the Indians for twice its value, or such a matter, and were seeking to be let off.

Mr. McGUIRE. The only exception that has been made to this rule in the last fifty years has been in Oklahoma and one or two other points.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, possibly I can give the gentleman from Illinois a little light on this subject. Here is the proposition: It is not the policy of the Government to get the very last dollar out of lands for the Indians. The idea is to divide these lands up and get as many white men intermingled with the Indians as possible. But, further than that, this great irrigation project, if I am right, was planned with a view of putting water on these lands. Now, if they are allowed to be sold in a body at the end of five years, as the provisions of the bill opening the reservation provide, they can go into the hands of a single person or corporation, be withheld from this irrigation project, and, in a measure, defeat it, because it will make the balance of the lands that have already been brought under the project bear an unreasonable part of the cost of the plant.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MARSHALL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that anybody will buy this land for the purpose of keeping it out of reclamation and irrigation when it would be worth five or ten times as much by being irrigated?

Mr. MARSHALL. But the gentleman must remember this——

Mr. MANN. They may be very foolish people out West, but I do not think anybody is foolish enough in the West to do that.

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman who buys this land and puts it under the irrigation project will be obliged to part with every particle of it except one unit, which is perhaps 80 or 160 acres, so there is no possibility of one man bringing all these lands under this project and no particular object for him to divide it up, because they compel him to sell it and sell it quickly.

Mr. MANN. The cost of this irrigation, as I understand it, is paid out of the Indians' money?

Mr. MARSHALL. No, indeed. It is paid out of an assessment on the lands, and paid by the man who buys them.

Mr. MANN. On the Indians' lands?

Mr. MARSHALL. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. Is it not, like these other provisions in the bill here, advanced out of the Treasury and reimbursed to the Treasury out of the funds coming from the Indians' lands?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In other words, we make an experiment at the Indians' expense. If it is successful, we take the benefits. If we lose, they are the ones who lose. That is a jug-handled experiment.

Mr. MARSHALL. Not at all. The homesteader, or whoever gets this land, pays the Indian his money, and pays enough to make the Indian whole for the cost of the project. It does not cost the Indian a cent.

Mr. MANN. It does not cost the Indian a cent if it is successful.

Mr. MARSHALL. Nor if it is unsuccessful. The idea is to make this project a success.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had reserved the point of order; I now make it.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems clear to the Chair that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana is legislative in character, and not in order on a general appropriation bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Winnebago tribe of Indians the sum of $883,249.58, being the balance of the unappropriated amounts due said tribe under the fourth article of the treaty of November 1, 1837, to wit, $804,909.17 (7 Stat. L., 544), and the act of July 15, 1870, $78,340.41 (16 Stat. L., 355), and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to pay per capita to the members of the tribe the said sum, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, in the same manner as provided by the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. L., 201).

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a provision such as we often make with reference to Indian agreements, where the United States agrees to pay to Indians a certain sum of money and until it is so paid to pay them interest on that fund. This particular amount has never yet been set aside in the Treasury and appropriated, although the agreement provides that we shall pay them interest upon such particular sum; and heretofore they have been paid interest thereon. Now, we capitalize the full amount and put it in the power of the Secretary of the Interior, under the provisions of existing law, to pay to each individual Indian whom he may determine upon investigation is competent to take care of his own affairs his share of that particular sum.

Mr. MANN. On what basis does it capitalize?

Mr. SHERMAN. It capitalizes on the basis of 5 per cent.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any idea how much there is outstanding of this sort of obligation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I could tell the gentleman correctly by reference to the book. It is several million dollars; I have not the exact amount in mind, and I have not the book with me here. I would guess the total amount of Indian funds in the Treasury which have been set aside by appropriations in cases similar to this would amount to something like thirty-one or thirty-two millions of dollars, as I now recall. The greatest amount due to any single tribe is the Osages, which amounts to something over $8,000,000. Altogether it is something over $30,000,000. I can not give the exact amount from memory.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the board of county commissioners of Ormsby County, Nev., for damages to the public road caused by the breaking of the dam belonging to the Indian school at Carson City, Nev., the sum of $70 from an unexpended balance of the appropriation "Indian school, Carson City, Nev., 1907," not required for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order against that paragraph. I do not know but what it may be better to pay it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It went out last year on a point of order, and if the gentleman makes the point of order this year it will have to go out, because it is clearly subject to it.

Mr. MANN. Why should it be in the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because they could not get it in any other place. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not know that the committee was easier to work than any other.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. It is something that the Indian agent at that locality thought ought to be paid, and there was an unexpended balance of the sum appropriated for the fiscal year 1907. He desired to pay it out of that fund, but had no authority to do so, and he asked Congress to grant him authority. It was sent here with a favorable recommendation by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs last year, and was put in the bill, and went out on a point of order, undoubtedly raised by the gentleman from Illinois, who is here with his watchful eye and thoughtful care of the Treasury; and it will have to go out this year if the gentleman makes the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I do not think items of this sort ought to be in the bill. If this was a case of a poor widow——

Mr. SHERMAN. I never was in very hearty sympathy with it myself, but it is in the bill, and I would like to see it remain there.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and civilization of Indians at Fort Berthold Agency, in North Dakota, including pay of employees, $20,000.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 23, insert a new paragraph, to read:

"For payment to such Indians of the Fort Berthold Reservation, in North Dakota, as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine to be entitled thereto the value of certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907, said value to be ascertained and determined by the said Secretary of the Interior, $13,860, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Chairman, I received my information regarding this matter too late to appear before the committee; I have, however, a letter from the acting commissioner, under date of January 25, 1909, which reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 25, 1909.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The office has received your letter of January 14 inclosing a communication from Superintendent Hoffman, of the Fort Berthold Agency, in regard to the claim of certain Indians of his agency for infected horses destroyed by order of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, in 1906 and 1907.

There does not appear to be any way in which these Indians can be compensated unless an appropriation for the purpose is made by Congress.

I shall be very glad to have such an appropriation made. The horses were condemned to prevent the spread of an infectious disease, and the Indians were given to understand that they would be remunerated to the value of the horses destroyed.

The office has no further information concerning the number and value of the animals destroyed or the names of the owners.

An item of appropriation, however, might be drawn so as to authorize payment after due investigation. Probably the following would answer the purpose:

"For payment to such Indians of the Fort Berthold Reservation in North Dakota as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine to be entitled thereto, the value of certain horses condemned and destroyed by the Bureau of Animal Industry in the years 1906 and 1907, said value to be ascertained and determined by the said Secretary of the Interior, $13,860, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

I return Superintendent Hoffman's letter.

Very respectfully,

R. G. VALENTINE,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman inform the committee why that was not brought before the Committee on Indian Affairs for investigation?

Mr. MANN. He said he did not get it until too late.

Mr. GRONNA. The claim came too late for me to bring it before the committee. They had already reported the bill out.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Were the horses killed because they had some disease?

Mr. MANN. Glanders.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Were they condemned by some competent authority?

Mr. GRONNA. They were condemned and killed by an agent of the Government.

Mr. HINSHAW. Of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many horses were killed?

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and eighty-one.

Mr. GRONNA. One hundred and eighty-one. There is also a bill introduced in the Senate by Senator MCCUMBER, on which a favorable report has been made.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Who estimated the value?

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to state that I have here a letter addressed to Senator MCCUMBER, and I had a similar letter sent to the committee, but which was mislaid. This is the letter from Mr. Hoffman, the agent on the Indian reservation.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any letter from the Agricultural Department on the subject?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Doctor Wiley, for instance.

Mr. MANN. Doctor Wiley kills a great many bad things, but he does not kill horses on account of the glanders.

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to read a letter from the agent sent out by the Agricultural Department under the Bureau of Animal Industry:

If a successful extermination of glanders is to be effected this following summer, the Indians will have to be made to understand that they will be remunerated for their horses which are destroyed. The conditions on the reservation are such that it will be very easy for the Indians to hide their suspicious cases in the timber on the bottom lands along the river, and in the Bad Lands. Unless they know they are to be given a fair price for their horses which will be destroyed, much difficulty will be experienced in finding their worst cases.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I believe the gentleman is a lawyer. As a matter of fact would not the courts in passing upon this question require the Government—your State, for instance, or the United States Government—to pay the actual value of the property at the time it was destroyed? Is not that the measure of damages?

Mr. GRONNA. If the gentleman will have the amendment read again, I believe the amendment provides for that. The damages will be such as the department may determine.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman consider a glandered horse of any value whatever? Isn't he worse than nothing? In fact, would it not be a benefit to the tribe of Indians to have it destroyed?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the gentleman that unless the Indians had been given to understand that they would be reimbursed, it would cost the Government a great deal more to exterminate this disease than it would be allowing them a fair price for the horses.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. By what authority would the agent of the Government give such advice as that to the Indians?

Mr. GRONNA. I can not say.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You have laws against glanders in your State.

Mr. GRONNA. We have.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Glandered stock?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the State pay full value for a glandered horse destroyed?

Mr. GRONNA. We do, to an amount not to exceed $100 for a horse.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. For every horse?

Mr. GRONNA. For every horse.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Condemned and killed in your State?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Who makes this valuation?

Mr. GRONNA. The veterinary surgeon—the state veterinary.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And you pay for the horses in that way?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that the amount you propose to pay here, that the Government shall pay these Indians?

Mr. GRONNA. No.

Mr. MARSHALL. It is left to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GRONNA. Such amount as the Secretary of the Interior may determine to be just.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman any report from the Department of Agriculture or the Bureau of Animal Industry on this subject?

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague has.

Mr. MARSHALL. He just read from the report of E. J. Cary, veterinary surgeon.

Mr. MANN. I have that in my hand. That is no report on the point.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, it is; it covers this proposition. I have another report.

Mr. MANN. No report of how many horses were destroyed?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; there is.

Mr. MANN. Not from the Bureau of Animal Industry, the people who destroyed the horses; no report as to the value of the horses from the bureau that destroyed them. One department of the Government does a thing, and the gentleman goes to another department of the Government to get the information. What reason is there for not applying to the department that did the work to know what was done?

Mr. GRONNA. This is a report from the parties that did the work.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman reads from a report in which it says that something should be done, and then not a word more from the department of the Government that did it.

Mr. GRONNA. If the gentleman will look on page 2 he will see a report——

Mr. MANN. A report from somebody else to the Indian agent that the man from the Agricultural Department did something. Why do we not have a report from the Agricultural Department as to what they did, let me ask the gentleman? We are constantly destroying noxious and communicable diseases of animals that are dangerous. We have just passed an appropriation for stamping out the foot-and-mouth disease, and are likely to be called upon for a considerable additional appropriation. We carry every year in the agricultural bill a large sum of money for the purpose of paying for just such things as this. If the case arose in the way stated, it is easy to get the money out of the direct appropriation or in a deficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I have a letter from the Acting Commissioner of the Indian Office.

Mr. MANN. He did not destroy the horses?

Mr. GRONNA. No; but I want to say that if there are no horses destroyed there will be no money paid out.

Mr. MANN. Here is the point: The Government in stamping out a disease like glanders pays, as I understand, the real value of the animal that is taken, but a horse that has the glanders is not worth anything. The sooner it is dead the better; it is of no use. Now, I do not know whether this comes within the rule of the Department of Agriculture in such cases or not, but I see no reason for making a distinction, giving the Indians a better service than is given the white men as the owners of these horses.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that the Bureau of Animal Industry is authorized to pay, and does pay, out of this appropriation for animals killed?

Mr. MANN. In some cases I understand that is the case.

Mr. MONDELL. And they have the authority to do it?

Mr. MANN. They have the authority and the money, and they do it.

Mr. MONDELL. If that can be done it means that all the States will proceed to unload charges of this kind on the Federal Government.

Mr. MANN. All the States are trying to do it, and the gentleman's own State is one of them, but Congress does not undertake to do all of it.

Mr. MONDELL. That is entirely new to me. My State is paying out a considerable amount of money every year for glandered horses that are killed and other horses that are killed, but if the Federal Government is doing it elsewhere I am glad to know about it.

Mr. MANN. I do not undertake to say whether they pay for glandered horses or not, but I do know that we carry an appropriation under which they are authorized to expend money for the purpose of stamping out some of these diseases, as they are now spending money for stamping out the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. MONDELL. It is important to know whether the Federal Government has a right to spend money to pay for animals within a State——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman understands very well that the National Government has no more authority to go into a State and take a man's private property and destroy it without paying for it than has the State. If the State does it the State must make provision for it. If the General Government does it, the General Government must make provision for it.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand that the Congress ever authorized that kind of expenditure to pay money for animals killed. We have been behind the times in my State because the State has been paying for the animals killed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman can not convince me nor the the rest of the House that anything of that sort misses his State, because he is as diligent in looking after those things as anybody that ever came inside these walls. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Since the gentleman from Illinois has informed me on the subject I assure him that we will see that we get our share.

Mr. MANN. We pay for the vaccine to keep the gentleman's cattle well. We pay for it in Chicago.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not paying for animals killed.

Mr. MANN. No; that is paying for trying to keep them well.

Mr. GRONNA. Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to make one more statement; I read from the report:

> There does not appear to be any way in which the Indians can be compensated unless an appropriation is made by Congress. I shall be glad to have such an appropriation made. The horses were condemned to prevent the spread of an infectious disease, and the Indians were given to understand that they would be remunerated for the horses destroyed.

Now, this is a statement by the Acting Commissioner of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman himself think that when we seek to pay for property destroyed by the Department of Agriculture on the ground that they promise to pay for it, we ought to have a statement from the department as to what they say they did?

Mr. GRONNA. This amendment is drawn in such a way, I would say to the gentleman, that nothing could be paid to them. It will be paid out at the direction——

Mr. MANN. This amendment is drawn in such a way that the money will be paid to them and the Department of Agriculture will never know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I think I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to insist on his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing, if this bill is not to be passed to-night, to have the item go over without prejudice. I would not object to having the item passed over if the bill should not be finished to-night.

Mr. GRONNA. I hope that it will be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment may be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair understands that the point of order is pending against it.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For general incidental expenses of the Indian Service in Oklahoma, and for pay of employees, $22,000.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Insert, after the word "dollars," line 21, page 36: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, in his discretion, the sum of $500,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds on deposit to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, and pay the same to the members of said tribes, per capita, in such manner and under such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment becomes necessary from the fact that about seven years ago the major portion of their estate was sold, and about two years ago the rest of it was sold other than their allotments. Prior to the time this land was sold and the proceeds thereof placed in the Treasury as a trust fund, they used the lease money for their maintenance and support, but since the land has been sold and the money deposited in the Treasury, subject only to the order of Congress, these Indians have been without any support whatever. Delegations from the Indians have come on and asked that this be done. The Indian agent in charge of these Indians is here in the city now asking that this be done. The Indian Office, both the commissioner and the other parties of the Interior Department, have asked that it be done, and I think the chairman of the committee now has, perhaps not in his possession on the floor, but I am sure in his office, a letter to that effect. I would also state further, and I think the chairman of the committee will confirm it, that the Indian delegation has called on him in person and represented the facts there, and also the Indian agent did so to-day. I think the amount is necessary. It is their own money, the proceeds of their land that was sold a few years ago. They are in debt and they need the money to square themselves up and keep them going.

The money is drawing only 4 per cent, and the local rates of interest in Oklahoma are much higher, and this being needed it is a matter of poor economy to permit them to pay 10 or 12 per cent, and perhaps more, with the money on deposit here receiving only 4 per cent, and that paid by the Government itself. I hope that the point of order may not be made against this item, to the end that justice be done the Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, let me ask the gentleman what portion of the $500,000 which he proposes to have withdrawn is required to pay the debts of these Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. Replying to the chairman of the committee, I am not informed in detail as to the amount. However, the Indian agent who is in charge of the Indian bureau tells me this. He estimates that there are about 3,750 Indians, and he estimates that they owe in excess of $100 per capita on an average. Of course, in some cases they owe more and some less. That was about as near as he could estimate it for me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is correct in saying that I have a letter from the department which approves this proposition of permitting the withdrawal of the money. He is also correct in his statement that the agent for the Indians has called on me and urged me very earnestly to consent to this amendment; but what assurance can the agent or can anybody give us that if we permit the withdrawal of this fund to pay these debts a year from now the Indians would not be just as much in debt as ever?

Mr. FERRIS. Replying to that, I can only say this, that prior to the time the lands of the Indians were sold they then derived their money and lived upon their lease money, but since these lands have been sold the money has been in trust and not subject even to the order of the Interior Department. They are a class of people—the Comanche and Kiowas—of which some have begun farming and others have expressed a desire to farm if they can obtain the means.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we are to permit the withdrawal now of a half a million dollars of their fund, and it takes four-fifths of that to pay their existing debts, it leaves a very small per capita, does it not, to assist them in supporting and maintaining themselves by farming?

Mr. FERRIS. I agree with the chairman in every respect, but it is now the expressed policy of the Indian Office that that whole amount should be turned over to them, aggregating some $3,000,000 on deposit and some $6,000,000 now due them for lands the settlers owed for—that the whole amount should be turned over to them and the policy inaugurated of establishing them on their homesteads, which policy I heartily favor, knowing them as I do and having lived among them as long as I have. However, I thought that was too big a project to be undertaken at the short session, and I thought this would be temporary and the Congress could afterwards devise means for meeting the situation.

Mr. SHERMAN. This $6,000,000 that is due them, it is part of that $6,000,000 the payment of which we extended the time for the other day?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; and they have more than $3,000,000 on deposit now that is not available at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it. If we give $500,000 now we will be asked undoubtedly a year from now to appropriate three or four or five hundred thousand dollars again; and would not that lead us to believe that in future years when this is expended we will have to appropriate large sums in form of gratuities to care for these Indians?

Mr. FERRIS. As again suggested, the amount that they would receive I think the chairman would hardly want to call an appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am talking about the eventual appropriation. This is not an appropriation; this is an expenditure of part of their funds, but I was talking about what we may eventually be called upon to do.

Mr. FERRIS. I anticipate and I think I fully understand what the chairman says, but I want to urge this one proposition, that Congress would hardly want to leave the Indians in a state of destitution, these Kiowas and Comanches, when they have $3,000,000 on deposit not subject to their order and $6,000,000 due them which is withheld and they can not get hold of until some plan can be inaugurated so that it can be turned over to them.

Mr. MANN. Did not we have the same thing up last year or the year before?

Mr. FERRIS. I was not here the year before.

Mr. MANN. But since the gentleman has been here.

Mr. FERRIS. Last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have, in reference to these Indians and in reference to many others. There has been a payment to them per capita of some portion of their funds in the Treasury, but always on the theory of their ultimate betterment to put them in a position where they could do something to maintain and support themselves. Now, I understand this proposition is, largely, to provide means with which to pay existing debts. Why did the people trust them? This $500,000 withdrawal is not to provide for the present pressing needs, but is to provide for their present pressing creditors. That is about the size of it.

Mr. FERRIS. If I may be pardoned a little further, I will say that it is not only needed for existing indebtedness, but likewise for their pressing needs, because when an Indian is head over heels in debt and paying an exorbitant rate of interest I undertake to say that it is of pressing importance that he have some relief, because the dodging of and the evading of creditors—most of the Indians are honest, though some of them are dishonest, perhaps—is not a pleasant situation for the Indian to be in. And it seems to me it is not economy on the part of the Government to force him to pay exorbitant rates of interest when he has money on deposit and is only receiving a small rate of interest.

One word further regarding the necessity of payment of debts. It is true that it is for the payment of debts, but it is also for immediate relief. And I want to say one word further. From time immemorial these Indians have been paid in quarterly and semiannual payments, and now that their lands are sold there is not any money to give them unless Congress affords to them from their own means. The Interior Department has no authority to act in the premises without congressional authorization.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why is it that these Indians all have land that has been allotted to them, considerable quantities of land, and are not able to support themselves?

Mr. FERRIS. For the simple reason that they have no tools, they have no teams, and they have no houses. The Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache people do not live on their homesteads. They hang around the agencies and do not, as a rule, live on their Indian allotments.

Mr. MANN. They have not got to the point yet where they are willing to go to work on a farm and support themselves?

Mr. FERRIS. In the absence of any money whatever turned over to them to buy tools, or to buy houses, or to buy implements, their present state does not warrant them in going ahead, and they are, as the gentleman suggests, not yet willing to undertake the task of self-maintenance.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that if they had tools they would go to work and support themselves and cultivate their farms?

Mr. FERRIS. My impression is that in time they would; and it is my well-defined idea that a plan should be inaugurated whereby their money, or portions of it, and such assistance as the Government might see fit to render them should be expended in establishing them on their individual allotments and withhold further payments from them until they show some signs of work in their own behalf.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember that last year, when this matter was up, I said to the gentleman that if we paid their debts then, they would be just as much in debt a year from then—the same set of people, all of whom want to get the money out of the Treasury. If we pay the money now they will want just as much in another year, and in the course of a few years their principal will be all gone, and then there will be no money with which to buy tools, and no Indian supporting himself, and necessarily the Government, having been at fault in paying over the principal, will be compelled to support them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to suggest——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to suggest that there should be something paid these Indians in lieu of the lease money that they have had heretofore?

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything about that. I believe in giving these Indians anything that is proper.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Should they not have the interest on their money in lieu of the lease money that the cattlemen have paid them for the lands? We have had the use of the money, and they should have interest on the money instead of the lease money.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, when the proposition to allot these lands in severalty came up and was adopted, it was the expectation and intention that the Indians living upon the land, or otherwise, as they pleased, would be able to take care of themselves.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That may be true. But if the gentleman will figure just a moment, he would find that the $6,000,000 coming to them on the land sale, and $3,000,000 on hand now, would make $9,000,000, which at 4 per cent interest would amount to $360,000 per annum, would it not—more money than they derived from the lease money?

Mr. MANN. What is done with the interest money now?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There are $6,000,000 of it, I understand, not available, because the settlers have not paid for the land in full.

Mr. MANN. It seems they have been paid the interest; now what has been done with the money? They get the interest on $9,000,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On $3,000,000.

Mr. MANN. They get the interest on $9,000,000 each year, and still they go on year after year incurring debts to white men who want them to get in debt.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection until I repeat one statement that I wish to make more clearly, and that is this: Prior to 1901, when the Kiowa and Comanche country was sold, they had been receiving quarterly, semiannually, and annually payments from this lease money. Since the land was sold the money went into a trust fund, and is not available only upon congressional authorization for their use since that time. Now, when their lands are disposed of and they are forced to take up their residence on an allotment and the money is tied up in the Treasury, these people need assistance. They at least are deserving of the right to expend their own funds. And while the gentleman from Illinois very wisely suggests that they may come in next year asking for the same relief, I want to say that unless some new plan is devised by which they can be stimulated to establish themselves on that land, or until they are supplied with tools, horses, and implements, no doubt they will. It is merely asking for their own. They have no earning capacity. These Indians, many of them, are located in the county in which I live. I know them, their traits, and how they live. These people as they now stand differ widely from the other Indians of my State and need the assistance this amendment gives them.

Mr. HINSHAW. How does the amount received at interest compare with the amount received on the leases?

Mr. FERRIS. I am unable to give that. The lease money was distributed to them in quarterly, semiannual, and annual payments until they became reliant on it to a certain extent each year. Since their lands have been sold they have been unable to get this annually. However, last year the chairman of the committee and the House yielded to me and allowed me to put on an amendment for their immediate necessities. It was necessary last year, and it is necessary this year, and unless some new plan is devised it will be necessary hereafter.

Mr. HINSHAW. Why not change the law so that they can get the interest quarterly as they did get the grass money quarterly?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Do they not get the interest now?

Mr. FERRIS. They get the interest now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman one minute tells us that they have nothing, and the next minute tells us that they get the interest. I do not mean that the gentleman would mislead the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I feel sure the gentleman from Illinois has no desire to misquote me, not even misquote my intentions.

My statement, as I recall it, is they neither have the land nor the money, meaning the lands that were sold and the proceeds derived therefrom. It is true that they have the interest on this fund, also true they have their individual allotments. The Kiowas and Comanches are a dependent people with both their land and money tied up, and they will be in this condition until they are assisted and forced to establish themselves on their allotments.

Mr. MANN. They now have land and interest on their fund, and, like everybody else who are improvident, they are not satisfied until they get the principal.

Mr. SHERMAN. In view of the fact that the department asked that this authorization be given, and in view of the fact that the agent down there is most earnest in his desire to have the authorization given, I hesitate to insist upon the point of order. But I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman rather than insist upon the point of order: Let us pass this by, and if the gentleman will draw an amendment providing that, for instance, $250,000 may be withdrawn, not to pay their debts, but to supply their necessities for the coming year, I will not object to that. Let those people who have trusted them and gotten them in debt—and I have no doubt sold them pianos and sewing machines and all sorts of things, and who expected them to loot the Treasury for their fund—let them wait a while longer by providing that $250,000 may be withdrawn and expended through the department or the bureau, I do not care which way you put it, for their support during the coming year and for furnishing such agricultural implements and the like as necessary to make it possible for them to support themselves, and I will not make any objection.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee to dictate the amendment to the Clerk.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply ask unanimous consent to pass by this amendment without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the pending amendment be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I asked that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota be passed without prejudice. I would like to have it recurred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota at this time. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. I reserved the point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS] has obtained some information in regard to it which I think would, as I indicated to him, probably satisfy me and the House in reference to the matter.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have communicated with the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Doctor Melville, who stated to me that these animals were destroyed to prevent the spread of a disease there, and it was an understanding between the bureau and the Indian Department that this was for the remuneration of the Indians for these horses.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that at the time of the destruction of the horses it was not understood that they were to be paid for out of the fund provided for the Bureau of Animal Industry, but, being an Indian matter, that they should be paid for out of Indian Department funds.

Mr. COCKS of New York. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That being the understanding, I withdraw the point of order.

The amendment of Mr. GRONNA was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi tribe of Indians the unappropriated sums of $200,000, due under the second article of the treaty of October 21, 1837 (7 Stat. L., p. 540), and $800,000 under the second article of the treaty of October 11, 1842 (7 Stat. L., p. 596).

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] whether this and the preceding item in any way involve the controversy between the Sac and Fox Indians of Iowa and those of Oklahoma?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, Mr. Chairman; the pending suit has reference to other funds than either of those appropriated for here.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Osage Nation of Indians, the sum of $14,000 for the erection of a new building at the Osage Boarding School, Oklahoma, to replace the one recently destroyed by fire.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 3 to 8, inclusive, on page 40. That provision has already been cared for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, strike out lines 3 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. SHERMAN. That has already been cared for in the deficiency bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT AGENTS.

Supplemental to the funds appropriated and available for expenses connected with the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, there is hereby appropriated for the salaries and expenses of district agents and other employees connected with the work of such agents, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90,000, to be immediately available and available until expended as the Secretary of the Interior may direct; and all powers heretofore conferred by law on said district agents, who are designated by the act of May 27, 1902 (35 Stat. L., p. 312), as "local representatives" of the Secretary of the Interior, are continued in full force and effect: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to employ of such district agents such number, not exceeding five, as he deems proper, to perform like duties as those now performed by them among the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma in other portions of that State.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, a provision similar to this was carried last year in the bill known as the "removal of restrictions bill," and under that provision agents, who are called "district agents," to the number of about 50, have been appointed and are now acting, and are doing a very important work in the portion of Oklahoma which heretofore has been known as "the Indian Territory." They have been engaged in looking after the interests of the Indians in every possible way, seeing that those who have not selected their allotments select them, seeing that they are not defrauded out of their lands, that they do not enter into leases for a consideration which is not adequate, and all that sort of thing. They are rendering a very important service for the benefit of the Indians. It is a service now in existence.

Mr. MANN. Is this connected with the land frauds down there?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; not what the gentleman calls land frauds. It is connected wholly with the Indian Service.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of making the fund here available until expended?

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the theory is that, all of it not being used during this fiscal year, whatever is unused can be used during the next fiscal year.

Mr. MANN. That would apply to any appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. I know of no other reason for putting it in.

Mr. MANN. What differentiates this from the ordinary appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Nothing that I know of. It is a question of the importance of the service, that is all; and if they do not use it all during this coming fiscal year, the desire is that what is not used that year may be used in the following year.

Mr. MANN. Is there any reason why next winter the committee considering this bill should not be informed as to the necessity for this service?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; and there is no expectation of not informing them.

Mr. MANN. They could not be informed if this goes in.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. They would not know anything about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We are always informed as to the condition of every appropriation. I will say to the gentleman that there is not a year that we are not informed of the condition of every fund, exactly how much was expended during the fiscal year, exactly how much was left on hand, and all that sort of thing, and we will have that same information next year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman refers to the Book of Estimates?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I do not. The gentleman misunderstands. Fuller information than the Book of Estimates ever contains is required by the committee from the department every year, and we get it. I can tell the gentleman, for instance, the amount that was left over in every particular fund that was appropriated for in our bill the last fiscal year, and what the condition of the fund was on January 1 of this year.

Mr. MANN. Tell us about this fund, how much was appropriated and how much was expended.

Mr. SHERMAN. This was not included in last year's appropriation bill and therefore I have not the figures for this one item. Every item included in last year's appropriation bill I have the figures for.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly it. I said, if this was not to be in the appropriation bill next year there would be no information furnished about it. The fund has been appropriated, and has been expended, and the gentleman's committee has not been given any information concerning it. I do not know anything about the item, and do not pretend to; but I make the point of order on so much of the item in lines 18 and 19 as reads "and available until expended."

Mr. SHERMAN. The point of order is well taken, I will admit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "two," in line 22, page 41, and inserting the word "eight." It is a clerical or typographical error.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 41, line 22, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 36 of the pending bill to offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to return to page 36 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert on page 36, line 21, after the word "dollars," the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to withdraw from the Treasury of the United States, at his discretion, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the funds on deposit to the credit of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, and pay out the same for the benefit of the members of said tribes for their maintenance and support for the ensuing year in such manner and under such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. MANN. On that I reserve a point of order. What is the difference between this and the other except in amount?

Mr. SHERMAN. The other authorized the withdrawal of the fund, and it was stated that it would be used to the amount of $400,000 in the payment of existing debts. Now this eliminates existing debts. It leaves the people who have been foolish enough to trust the Indians, and perhaps not only foolish enough to trust them but so criminal, if I may use the word, as to induce them to go into debt, leaving them to wait for their money, and it is provided that $250,000 of their own money may be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for their support and maintenance during the coming year. That is the difference between the two.

Mr. FERRIS. This provides for $250,000 and the other provided for $500,000.

Mr. MANN. How much do the Indians now receive as interest on their fund?

Mr. SHERMAN. They must receive in the neighborhood of $300,000.

Mr. MANN. How much per capita?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should say about $80.

Mr. MANN. Eighty dollars for each one in the family?

Mr. FERRIS. They do not get that much, for a part of it is outside money that no interest is paid on.

Mr. MANN. We provided the other day for interest on town-site sections. Each one in the family gets the money—one man gets it for all in the family. It seems to me that a family of Indians with a homestead and that much clear coming to him ought to be able, if he is ever going to be able, to begin to learn the necessity for living on his income.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman that the land is all new; it is a prairie country, and the land is not yet reduced to cultivation. When it is reduced to cultivation it can be rented for from one to five dollars an acre, according to the value of the land. Now, that would be quite an income to have; but wild land, fresh land, can not be rented to the farmers.

Mr. MANN. That is it; it can be rented to white men. I want the Indians to understand that it is their business to cultivate the ground themselves or else for us to understand that we have got to support them for all time, and if so, we had better keep the fund and support them on the interest. Here is a proposition to give them the land which you do not expect them to cultivate, and also the funds, which were supposedly to protect us, and in the end we will have to take care of them.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The white men will have to make a living for them.

Mr. MANN. It may be that the white men will have to make a living for them. I have discovered by observation and reading in this world that the only way anybody makes a living is for fear of starvation or freezing to death. Nobody here would work if it was not for fear of those two things. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. I hope there will not be any misunderstanding, Mr. Chairman, as to the amount of money that the Indians receive.

The report of the Secretary last year shows that they received $50 per capita as interest, and the prior years it was $30.

Mr. MANN. For each Indian.

Mr. FERRIS. Instead of receiving $80 last year, they received $30, and the year before nothing, and this year $50.

Mr. MANN. That is it; it is going up all the time, and the debts are just as much; and if we gave them $500,000, they would owe just as much as they do now. That is the system the gentleman wants to encourage. We ought to stick to the policy of having these people do some work, and I make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is new legislation, not in order on an appropriation bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make an investigation of the status of all tracts of land reserved for members of the Creek, Choctaw, and Chickasaw tribes of Indians under the Creek treaty of March 24, 1832 (7 Stat. L., 366), the Choctaw treaty of September 27, 1830 (7 Stat. L., 333), the Chickasaw treaty of October 27, 1830 (7 Stat. L., 381), and the Chickasaw treaty of May 24, 1834 (7 Stat. L., 450), for which patents have not been issued, or conveyances made by the reservees under the treaties have not been approved by the President, and he shall report his conclusions with his recommendation concerning any action by the Congress needed to clear up the titles to those lands, and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of the investigation provided for herein.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the whole paragraph that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the completion of the work heretofore required by law to be done by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, $140,000, said appropriation to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 19, page 43:
"Said appropriation to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who is directed to so disburse this appropriation as to complete said work by July 1, 1910."

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order simply for the purpose of asking whether that extends the time another year.

Mr. CARTER. It does extend the time for twelve months.

Mr. MANN. We have put this sort of a provision in the bill several times. Does it amount to anything?

Mr. CARTER. I think this is the first time it has been in for several years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course it does not amount to anything. It was in last year.

Mr. MANN. I know it was. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CARTER. I just want to state this, That I have been requested very urgently to make a point of order against that provision, but I have not done it, primarily, because it is necessary for some of this money to be appropriated, possibly all of it, and, secondarily, I wanted to see our worthy chairman, before he was exalted to the high position of the second highest office in this great Republic, get through his last supply bill in the House with as little contention as possible from the members of his own committee. For these reasons I have not made the point of order against it, and I would like very much to see the amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I make the point of order against the amendment. I do not think this ought to be limited, the time in which to close these rolls.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that Congress, in its endeavor to close up the business of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians in Oklahoma in a very short time, has failed to enroll Indians that should have been enrolled and permitted others to be enrolled that should not have been enrolled. This is not my assertion, but the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Garfield, to this Congress in an official communication, viz, his annual report for the year 1907, page 20. If this is true, and no one will dispute it, we should not close the rolls before we purge them.

The Supreme Court in the Stephens case (174 U. S. Repts.) holds that Indians are the wards of the Government; hence Congress is the court that must distribute their property to them justly and fairly, and if we do not, but disinherit part of the heirs and give part of the estate to parties not heirs, then we will render the Government, in my judgment, subject to having to pay the disinherited Indians for the property we have unjustly given to Indians not entitled to it.

Now, to obviate this danger, while we have, still belonging to this estate and in our hands, subject to our disposition, surplus land and money enough to give all these Indians their share of this property, we should open up these rolls and let the Indians of these tribes by blood be enrolled and have their property given to them. I would not disturb any Indians now in possession of the land allotted to them, but I would give to those entitled to it as Indians by blood all the remaining property; and with that end in view I have introduced the following bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of an act approved February 6, 1901 (chap. 217, U. S. Stat. L., 56th Cong.), entitled "An act amending the act of August 15, 1894, entitled 'An act making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaties and stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes,'" be, and the same is hereby, extended to any person claiming any right in the common property of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians or tribes; and in order to make said act applicable to any person claiming any such right in said property said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That all persons who are, in whole or in part, of Choctaw or Chickasaw blood or descent and who are entitled to share in the common property of the Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians under any treaty with said Indians or law of Congress, or who claim to be so entitled under any treaty, grant, agreement, or act of Congress, or who claim to have been unlawfully denied or excluded from participating in the common property of the Choctaws or Chickasaws to which they claim to be lawfully entitled by virtue of any treaty, grant, agreement, or act of Congress, may commence and prosecute or defend any action, suit, or proceeding in relation to their right thereto in the proper district or circuit court of the United States; and said district and circuit courts are hereby given jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine any action, suit, or proceeding arising within their respective jurisdiction and involving the right of any person, in whole or in part of Indian blood or descent, to share in the common property of said Choctaw or Chickasaw Indians under any treaty, grant, agreement, or law of Congress (and in said suit the parties thereto shall be the claimant as plaintiff, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes jointly as party defendant); and the judgment or decree of any such court in favor of any claimant to share in the common property of said tribes shall have the same effect, when properly certified to the Secretary of the Interior, as if such judgment or decree had been allowed and approved by him: Provided, That the right of appeal shall be allowed to either party, as in other cases, and that no act of Congress or agreement limiting the time in which an application or assertion of right should be made shall operate to defeat the rights of any person entitled to share in the said common property under any treaty with or grant to said Indians.

"SEC. 3. That the plaintiff shall cause a copy of his petition, filed under the preceding section, to be served upon the district attorney of the United States in the district wherein suit is brought, and shall mail copies of same, by registered letters, to the principal chief or governor of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, and shall thereupon cause to be filed with the clerk of the court wherein suit is instituted an affidavit of such service and the mailing of such letters. It shall be the duty of the district attorney upon whom service of petition is made as aforesaid to appear and defend the interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations in the suit, and within sixty days after the service of petition upon him, unless the time should be extended by order of the court made in the case, to file a plea, answer, or demurrer on the part of the Indian governments or tribes, and to file a notice of any counterclaim, set-off, claim for damages, or other demand or defense whatsoever in the premises: Provided, That should the district attorney neglect or refuse to file the plea, answer, demurrer, or defense, as required, the plaintiff may proceed with the case under such rules as the court may adopt in the premises; but the plaintiff shall not have judgment or decree for his claim, or any part thereof, unless he shall establish the same by proof satisfactory to the court.

"SEC. 4. That wherever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court in which the proceedings has been instituted that there is in the possession of any department of the Government or of any bureau, division, or commission thereof or thereunder, any record or records material to the proper determination of the issue being heard, or about to be heard, the head of the department in which such record is kept shall, upon request of the judge of said court, transmit a certified copy of the record or records on file in his department to the clerk of the court to be used at the trial of the case without any charge therefor: Provided further, That all records in the possession or custody of any government officer or department or division, bureau, or commission thereof or thereunder pertaining or appertaining to the rights of any such claimant shall, upon request of the claimant or his authorized attorney, be open to inspection; Provided further, That all suits brought under the provisions of this act shall be commenced within six months after the passage of this act, and the court, upon the request of either the plaintiff or defendant, shall advance any suit instituted under the provisions of this act on the dockets thereof to as early hearing as is consistent with the rights of the parties and the interests involved."

Mr. Chairman, this bill should become a law. If it does not, hundreds of Indian families will lose their homes and become outcasts. Let me give you a true history of this matter. By article 2 of a treaty negotiated September 27, 1830, and ratified by the Senate of the United States and proclaimed as a law on February 24, 1831 (7 Stats., 333), the United States agreed to specially convey certain lands west of the Mississippi River (and which are now being allotted) in fee-simple title to the Choctaw Nation in trust for the exclusive use and benefit of a designated class of persons composed of all those persons comprising the Choctaw community on the day the treaty was ratified and their descendants.

On March 24, 1837, the Senate of the United States ratified a treaty entered into by the Choctaws and Chickasaws, by terms and provisions of article 1 of which treaty those persons comprising the Chickasaw community on the day the treaty was ratified and their descendants acquired by purchase an equal, undivided individual interest in the property agreed to be conveyed to the Choctaws by article 2 of the treaty of 1830, on the same terms that the Choctaws held it, and by this treaty the Chickasaws became a part of the designated class of Choctaws for whose exclusive use and benefit the grant was to be made.

On February 24, 1842, the President of the United States specially conveyed by patent the said western lands in fee-simple title to the Choctaw Nation, to be held by said nation in trust for the exclusive use and benefit of said designated class of persons.

By act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, a commission known as the "Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes" was directed to receive, consider, and determine applications of persons claiming citizenship in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations preparatory to the preparation of final citizenship rolls to be used as a basis for the distribution in severalty of the tribal property. Said act expressly directed said commission to determine all such applications according to the treaties with and laws of the United States. This act required the enrollment of all persons who made application who were of the said designated class of persons named in the treaties and the grant. Said act further provided that either the Indian nations (who were represented by their officials and attorneys) or the applicants could appeal from the decision of the commission to the United States district courts. Only a comparative few of the Choctaws and Chickasaws applied to said commission under said act, and of the number who applied, appeals were taken to the United States district courts in cases involving the rights of about 5,000 persons. The United States district courts heard the cases and rendered judgments admitting to citizenship approximately 4,000 persons. Appeals were taken in these cases from the judgments of the United States district courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, which court affirmed said judgments. (174 U. S., 476.) Thereafter, by act approved July 1, 1902, a legislative commission, designated therein as the "Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court," was created with authority to review, revise, and annul said judgments entered by said United States district courts and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The attorneys (Mansfield, McMurray, and Cornish) who procured this legislation held inviolate contracts with the officials of the Indian governments by which, in the event they could secure a reversal of said judgment rendered by the federal courts, they were to receive 9 per cent of the value of the property each such person was entitled to receive under said judgment.

This citizenship court rendered judgments and decrees affirming the judgments of the federal courts in cases involving the rights of 156 persons and reversed and rendered null and void the judgments of the federal courts in cases involving the rights of approximately 3,800 claimants. This citizenship court, under congressional act approved March 3, 1903, was authorized to fix the compensation of the attorneys who secured the legislation under which the court was created, for their entire services rendered in these cases, both in procuring the legislation and conducting said cases before said citizenship court. Said court under said act entered a decree awarding a fee of $750,000 to said attorneys, but did not state upon what basis the allowance was made.

The charge has often been made that certain members of the citizenship court were improperly, if not corruptly, influenced to render said judgments, and thereby deny to upward of 4,000 Indians their property rights which had been decreed them by the federal courts. It is believed by many persons that there was just ground for said charge, and that these people were improperly, if not fraudulently, denied their property rights by federal officers who profited financially thereby.

Mr. Chairman, on April 29 of last year I offered a resolution, No. 389, authorizing the appointment of a subcommittee of this House to investigate the charge that this citizenship court had been corrupted or bribed to render the opinions they rendered in said cases. This resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules, and has never been reported from said committee. It is as follows, viz:

[House of Representatives. Resolution 389. Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

Whereas under an act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, the United States district courts in Indian Territory heard and determined the rights of approximately 5,000 people claiming citizenship in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations; and

Whereas the said United States district courts rendered judgments and decrees entitling approximately 4,000 of said persons to enrollment as Choctaw and Chickasaw citizens; and

Whereas said judgments were thereafter affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Whereas by an act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, a legislative commission therein designated as the Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court was created and authorized to readjudicate the rights of the said 4,000 persons who had procured judgments from the United States district courts, some of which judgments had been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Whereas said legislative commission, known as the Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court, heard and determined, or pretended to hear and determine, on review, the rights of said 4,000 persons who theretofore procured favorable judgments from the United States courts; and

Whereas said Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court rendered a finding, judgment, or decree affirming the judgments of the United States courts in cases involving the rights of only 156 persons and illegally, wrongfully, and it is charged corruptly, denied the rights of all other persons who had theretofore secured favorable judgments from the United States courts decreeing them to be citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and thus depriving them of their property and citizenship rights; and

Whereas said Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court awarded a fee of $750,000 to George Mansfield, J. F. McMurray, and Melvin Cornish, doing business under the firm name and style of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, for pretended legal services in procuring the enactment of legislation creating said court and in prosecuting said cases before said court; and

Whereas it is generally believed and charged that certain members of said court were corruptly induced to render said findings, judgments, or decrees denying said persons enrollment as Choctaws and Chickasaws for a money consideration paid to them out of the fee awarded to said attorneys: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House, or a subcommittee thereof consisting of three members, one of whom shall belong to the minority party, to be appointed by the chairman, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate said charges and to report the facts to the House; that said committee or subcommittee is further authorized to sit during the sessions of the House or during vacation, in Washington or elsewhere, to employ a stenographer and one clerk, to summon and subpœna witnesses and to compel their attendance, to administer oaths, to require the production of books and papers, and to exercise any and all other powers necessary to a full and complete investigation of the conduct of said court, or any member thereof, to the end that it may report the true facts to the House with reference to said charges; and it is further provided that the expense incident to said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That said committee shall report to the House whether, in their judgment, any of said Indians whose judgments were set aside by said court have been unjustly deprived of their property without due process of law, and if they so find, to suggest in their report appropriate legislation for restoring them to their personal and property rights as citizens of said tribes.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules and never reported from that committee. This citizenship court rendered some very strange opinions. One of the investigations made by the Senate shows that this court in the case of 17 different families put on part and left off part of families. This affidavit shows one example. It is as follows:

Anderson F. Cowling, of Cowlington, Okla., Choctaw by blood.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA, Pittsburg County, ss.

Personally appeared before me, Mrs. R. H. Tarter, a notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, Anderson F. Cowling, to me well known, who upon his oath deposeth and said:

That he is a citizen of the United States, a resident of the town of Cowlington, La Flore County, State of Oklahoma, and is 65 years of age; that he has been a resident of the Choctaw Nation for thirty-two years last past; that he is a son of Sallie Kemp, a Choctaw by blood, who was a daughter of Sol Kemp, a Choctaw by blood; that in the year 1896 affiant made application to the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes for the enrollment of himself, his wife, and three children as citizens of the Choctaw Nation by blood, under the act of June 10, 1896; that said application was allowed by said commission and affiant, his wife, and three children enrolled; that thereafter an appeal was taken to the United States district court, central district, Indian Territory, by the Choctaw Nation from said decision of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes enrolling affiant, but that no appeal was taken from the decision of the commission enrolling affiant's wife and his three children, notwithstanding the fact that the said children were enrolled as a result of the Indian blood of their father, affiant; that after a full hearing before said court a judgment was entered adjudging affiant to be a citizen of the Choctaw Nation; that thereafter his case, together with all other cases in which judgment had been rendered by the United States territorial courts for Indian Territory, was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that said United States Supreme Court rendered a decision affirming the decision of the United States territorial court adjudging affiant to be a citizen of the Choctaw Nation; that thereafter the judgment of the United States courts adjudging affiant to be a citizen of the Choctaw Nation was set aside by the legislative commission known as the "Choctaw-Chickasaw citizenship court," and that affiant is to-day without any recognition of his right to share in any of the common property of the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

Affiant further states that his three children were enrolled as blood citizens of the Choctaw Nation, by reason of his Indian blood, by findings of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior, and that they are now on the approved blood roll of the Choctaw Nation; that his wife is enrolled on the approved rolls of the Choctaw Nation as an intermarried citizen, deriving her enrollment by reason of her marriage to him.

ANDERSON F. COWLING.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this the 16th day of November, 1908.

[SEAL.] MRS. R. H. TARTER,
Notary Public.

My commission expires June 24, 1912.

The Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes was expressly directed by section 21 of said act to make the rolls in conformity with the treaties and laws of the United States, and to enroll as citizens all persons of Choctaw or Chickasaw blood and descent who were bona fide residents of said nations on the 28th day of June, 1898; and to prepare rolls of freedmen entitled to any rights or benefits under the treaty of 1866, and their descendants who were bona fide residents of said nations on June 28, 1898; and it was expressly provided that when the rolls were made as the act provided, and were approved by the Secretary of the Interior, they should be final.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under date of July 25, 1899, directed the commission in performing its work under said act as follows:

The rolls as made up by your commission must, to become final, receive the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. It will therefore be necessary for you to make a record of all cases sufficient to enable this office and the department to take intelligent action in the premises, and especially in those cases where your decision either for or against the right of any person to have his name appear upon the roll is complained of.

For the purpose of this record you will require each applicant for enrollment to present himself in person before the commission at one of its appointments within the tribe in which such applicant claims right to enrollment for examination under oath, his statements to be taken down by the commission, upon which the commission will determine his right to enrollment, and such record and action of the commission would be preserved and transmitted with the rolls to be considered by this office and the department when the rolls made by the commission are submitted for the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Tams Bixby and A. S. McKennon, two members of the commission, who had direct charge of the preparation of the citizenship and freedmen rolls, testified before the select committee of the Senate (vol. 1, S. Rept. No. 5013, 59th Cong., 2d sess.) that no person appearing before said commission was examined under oath and his or her statements reduced to writing as required by the departmental instructions.

On June 7, 1897, another act was approved directing the commission to enroll as citizens of said nations all persons whose names appeared on any approved roll of the Choctaws or Chickasaws and their descendants born after the approval of any of said rolls.

On June 28, 1898, Congress, acting upon the recommendation of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, passed an act giving the commission full authority to make correct and complete rolls of all persons entitled to share in the common trust property (H. R. Rept. 593, 55th Cong., 2d sess.).

There appears, therefore, no way by which any error committed by the commissioners in examining persons in the field could have been corrected on review by the Secretary, as the only record before the Secretary was such memorandum of evidence taken as the commission had seen fit to make of record.

Many persons of mixed Indian and negro blood, undoubtedly of the designated class of persons for whose benefit the grant was made, were enrolled by the commission as "freedmen" and no mention made in the memorandum of their Indian blood. These people under treaty stipulations appear to be entitled to as full property rights as Indians, many of them being, as appears from the evidence offered and photographs exhibited, of more than half Indian blood, and some of them practically full bloods.

Under date of March 17, 1899, Assistant Attorney-General Willis J. Vandevanter, in an official opinion rendered for the guidance of said commission, construed the act of June 28, 1898, to mean that all persons whose names lawfully appeared upon the tribal rolls and their descendants should be enrolled on the citizenship rolls of said tribes and should receive distributive shares of the common property of said Indians. (S. Rept. 5013, 59th Cong., 2d sess., p. 1555.) The report of the Secretary (pp. 49–50, Hearings on H. R. 15649) states that only such rolls as had been prepared by the Indian officials during the years 1885 to 1896, inclusive, were in the possession of or were consulted by either the commission or the department in the preparation of the citizenship rolls which are now being used as a basis for the distribution of the tribal property. It is charged that these rolls were prepared by individuals who were pecuniarily interested in the division of the estate and were notoriously inaccurate and incomplete.

The parties preparing the rolls were Mansfield, McMurry, and Cornish, the attorneys I have named before, and it was not proper for said commission to have used said rolls exclusively as a basis for the final citizenship rolls, particularly as there were then in the possession and custody of the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Treasury a large number of complete and authentic rolls of the members of said tribes, which were not consulted and which are believed to contain the names of many persons of Indian blood, or the names of the ancestors of many persons of Indian blood, who are undoubtedly of the same designated class of persons for whose exclusive use said grant was made, but who have been refused enrollment by said commission and said Secretary, and thereby denied the right to share in the common property.

It appears from incontestable evidence, and it is admitted by the Secretary of the Interior on page 20 of his annual report for the year ending June 30, 1907, that the rolls are incomplete and that many blood citizens are not enrolled who are entitled to enrollment, and it is claimed by the department that many persons have been enrolled who are not entitled to enrollment.

The official certifications contained in Senate Report No. 5013 (pt. 2, 59th Cong., 2d sess.) show that blood Indians have been enrolled as citizens and given distributive shares in the property, while their full brothers and sisters have been either denied enrollment, and thereby denied their lawful property rights, or enrolled as freedmen and given freedmen limited property rights of 40 acres of average land. It appears further from the report of the Secretary, set out in Senate Document No. 390, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, that during the week immediately preceding March 4, 1907, on which day the jurisdiction of the Secretary to approve enrollments terminated, the department examined and decided 2,023 cases, which it is claimed by attorneys for claimants involved the rights of approximately 10,000 persons. It is apparent that the Secretary could not have properly considered these cases in the time in which he had to act, and it would be unjust to deny these claimants their property rights because the administrative officers did not have time to properly consider their cases. Many other evidences of irregularities in the preparation of said rolls at least cast suspicion on the rolls as approved by the Secretary. For the reasons thus stated by me, I do not believe the said rolls as approved by the Secretary under existing law are final, for they have not been made as the statute provided they should be made; therefore my bill should pass, opening up these rolls, so that justice may be done.

Under agreements with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, ratified June 28, 1898, and July 1, 1902, each person enrolled as a citizen by the Secretary was to receive 320 acres of the average allottable lands and a distributive share of all funds; persons enrolled as freedmen were to receive 40 acres of the average allottable lands and were not to share in any funds.

I am firmly of the belief that, owing to the nature of the title to this property and the notorious mistakes committed by administrative officers (which have undoubtedly resulted in unlawfully depriving many persons of their property), the Government will become liable for millions of dollars in claims brought against it by persons whose rights have been thus denied. They have been always held to be the wards of the Government by Congress and by the courts, and if they are wards then the United States Government is their guardian and as such will be in law and morals bound to justly administer the estates of its wards, and my bill will accomplish that purpose. It does not seek to change existing law, but simply permits every person who claims a right in this property to go into the proper United States district or circuit court in Oklahoma, and there have his or her claim judicially determined. The same law is now in force in every jurisdiction in the United States except the eastern district of Oklahoma, and I can see no reason why the Choctaws and Chickasaws should be deprived of the benefits of a law which has met with universal approbation in every other jurisdiction and in every civilized country in the world.

The bill could be amended so as to authorize the Attorney-General of the United States to examine the rolls of the Choctaws and Chickasaws after they are prepared by the administrative officers under my proposed bill, and to investigate any suspicious enrollments, and if from said investigation he is satisfied that any person or persons have been unlawfully enrolled, to cause such names to be stricken from the rolls, or appeals could be provided for to the United States district or circuit courts.

Mr. Chairman, I will specifically point out certain Indians in the Choctaw Nation who are real Indians by blood, born in that country, and lived there always, that are not on the rolls, but are clearly entitled to be under the treaties of 1830 and 1866.

These people did not know of the requirements of the act of June 10, 1896, nor of the existence of said act. Some of these people, to wit, Sallie Berryman, for herself and children; Victoria Boyd, for herself and children; and Mrs. Banty, for herself and children; and several other heads of families, whose names I do not know, were applicants before the Choctaw council for enrollment in 1896, and again in 1897.

The council passed upon their testimony, said they were entitled to be enrolled, and upon the payment of $100 per head they would place them on the rolls. This they were not able to pay, went home to try to raise the money, and before council convened again the governor of the Choctaw Nation was notified that the council was without authority to enroll its members since the creation of the Dawes Commission. These applicants were notified by the council and instructed to go before the Dawes Commission at Atoka, Ind. T., in August, 1898, which they did. A. S. McKinnon was the acting chairman of said commission. He heard their applications and dismissed them, telling them that the commission was without authority to enroll them, and the said McKinnon refused and did not make any record of said applications, as I have before stated the law required this commission to do.

There were then some parties who complained to the department in Washington, with many affidavits as to the refusal of said McKinnon to make a record. These affidavits are, I presume, now on file in the department. In the year 1900 the commission was again instructed by the department to make a record of all those who made application, and just at this time the act of May 31, 1900, was enacted, depriving the commission of the right to receive or consider applications of Indians by blood, but to receive applications of Mississippi Choctaws; this was afterwards construed to apply only to those claiming rights under the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, and to give no rights to blood citizens.

At the very first opportunity, in the year 1900, they made application and were forced to make it as Mississippi Choctaws, notwithstanding they were Indians by blood, and said commission permitted them to introduce testimony and make a record, and these records are here on file in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and show clearly that these people are Indians by blood and entitled to enrollment.

Some of them supposed they were enrolled, and they may have been, for there were not then and are not now any rolls of several of those counties. Many of them did not make applications for enrollment until the time came to allot lands. It was the allotment that directed their attention to the necessity of the preservation of their rights.

The act of June 28, 1898, gave jurisdiction to the department; properly construed, it authorized the enrollment of every Indian by blood who was entitled, but the commission construed it otherwise and held they had no authority under this act to enroll applicants by blood.

People went before the commission desiring to apply for citizenship and were told that they were too late. They were told, however, that they could apply as Mississippi Choctaws, so a number made applications as Mississippi Choctaws just as soon as they learned that they could apply in that manner.

The term "Mississippi Choctaw" had no meaning in that country at that time, such as was subsequently given to it. They were all from Mississippi, and the common people construed the term to mean any enrolled Choctaw whose people had come from Mississippi.

By the act of May 31, 1900, these blood Indians were prevented from making any application at and after that date, but it should be remembered that none of their applications as Mississippi Choctaws had been taken up and considered at that time, so after it was too late to apply by blood the Mississippi Choctaw applications were taken up, and they were denied because they were not fourteenth article Mississippi Choctaws. By this method of whipsawing their little farms have been taken from them; they have been denied every right.

These people were entitled under the law, are entitled in equity; there is no reason that they should not be enrolled, for there is plenty of land, and if there are to be any corrections of the roll, the act should be plain enough to enroll them.

Their records are all before the department. No new testimony need be taken. They can file an application for reconsideration within sixty days if a time limit is given. It ought to be limited to Indians by blood otherwise entitled under the law, and then take off the limit of time which barred their applications; and, if they applied as Mississippi Choctaws and were Indians by blood because of a mistake or through ignorance, that fact should not bar them, for it was the duty of the officers to enroll those who were entitled.

The Dawes Commission went down there, not as a court to enforce strict pleading, but as a commission to enroll those entitled, and the duty still exists on the part of the Government to protect them. It can be properly done and the act can be made definite, and I most respectfully submit that this is the time to do it, and my bill will accomplish that result. Let me warn this Congress that if it refuses to enroll these Indians and if we divide up all of the land and property of the tribe among the favored ones now on the rolls and fail to give the others their share of their common estate, Congress will be besieged for many years with these claims for their distributive shares, to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD], on February 17 last year, in an eloquent and able speech, advocated the rights of the Mississippi Choctaws to enrollment. Speaking of the unjust acts of the Dawes Commission toward the Mississippi Choctaws, he said in that speech:

The first edict issued was that none but those residing in the Territory at that time could share in the distribution of the lands, but this was abandoned. Then it was contended that only those who could trace their ancestry back to a certain class who participated in the treaty could receive a share, and this, too, was abandoned; and next it was insisted that only the descendants of the full bloods could inherit, and this likewise was overruled.

Being forced to admit that the Choctaw territory belonged to the tribe in common, regardless of where they lived or who their ancestors were, or whether half blood or whole blood, it was decided that the only way to outlaw the Mississippi Choctaws was to railroad a law through Congress requiring them to immediately remove to the Territory and live upon their several allotments, and that unless this was done within six months they were forever barred. Under this unlawful, unjust, and cruel law they have lost all. The book of fate seems to be forever closed against them. It was the "unkindest cut of all."

Why, Mr. Chairman, this procedure was nothing less than legalized robbery. Upon what process of reasoning can we justify either the justice or the legality of such action? Can the Government after executing a fee-simple title to this estate afterwards destroy the title by entailing an impossible condition upon it? Certainly not. There is not a lawyer who ever read three pages of Blackstone who will disagree with me on this proposition. But, whether the law be or be not constitutional, the Mississippi Choctaws are bound by it just the same, for the reason that the Government is cloistered behind that relic of kingcraft, that the sovereign can do no wrong, nor be sued, except by consent. Bills are pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs providing that these poor people be given access to the courts to ascertain their rights, but not one of them will be reported, for to do so would mean the defeat of the well-planned scheme of robbery.

Then, too, how unreasonable was the proposition to require these poor people to remove to the Territory within the short period of six months. They were without means, ignorant, and helpless. But it is contended that the Government made an appropriation of $20,000 to move them. This might have sufficed to take some of them, but the whole amount was expended, and yet over 350 remained in Mississippi.

But admitting that they could have provided means for transportation, how were they to live on the blizzard-swept prairie, without houses, without food, clothing, or the implements of husbandry? Why, sir, a decree requiring the public-school children of this city to go and provide homes for themselves on the frozen plains of Manitoba would not have been more cruel and unreasonable. Many of those who did go died from exposure. In many instances they were crowded during a long, cold winter into cotton sheds, barns, and warehouses. Disease broke out among them, and in some instances whole families perished.

Let it never be forgotten that this Government since 1831 has been the self-constituted guardian of the Choctaws. Without invitation we assumed the right to administer this sacred trust. Have we kept faith with our wards? Let their destitution and the deeds of robbery perpetrated upon them answer. Were we discharging our duty with all fidelity to them when we leased their valuable oil and coal lands to corporations for a mere trifle, or when we paid one law firm a little less than $1,000,000 out of their common fund, in order to assist us in robbing them? Three hundred and fifty shares of that great sum was the lawful property of the Mississippi Choctaws and should have gone to them instead of to attorneys especially employed to defraud them. I don't say that these lawyers did not earn their fee. They won the case. With the aid of a few government officials they succeeded in robbing my Choctaw friends of an interest in an empire. I dare say that no Roman general ever more thoroughly looted or pillaged a conquered nation than did these officers and attorneys these unfortunate people.

But I understand that there are yet 3,000,000 acres of this common estate and about $400,000 unappropriated and unstolen. Now, in the name of reason and common justice, why not repeal this cruel statute and let these Mississippi Choctaws yet share in this common estate? If you are not willing to do this, then open the doors of the courts and let them sue for their property, and if you are blinded to this just demand, let me implore you to provide for their support by a direct appropriation from the Treasury.

My friend BYRD appealed to the President in behalf of the Mississippi Choctaws and received the following reply:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 18, 1908.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Referring to your letter of the 7th instant in regard to the condition of the Choctaws in Mississippi, the inclosed very interesting communication of Commissioner Leupp explains itself. Will you see Mr. Leupp and try to reach with him an agreement as to what can best be done to relieve the condition of these Choctaws, and then let me know? I will do all I can to aid you to secure the passage of a measure of relief. I thank you for the course you are taking in bringing up this matter, the urgency of which I keenly appreciate.

Sincerely, yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Hon. A. M. BYRD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Leupp, in reply to the above letter, states that:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, March 16, 1908.

The PRESIDENT: I have received Secretary Loeb's note of March 10, submitting letter of Hon. A. M. BYRD, House of Representatives, regarding the need of relief for the Choctaws remaining in Mississippi, and asking for my views as to whether anything can be done for them.

Mr. BYRD says that the four or five hundred Choctaws remaining in Mississippi are in a destitute condition and believes that some provision should be made for their support.

It is true, as he says, that the Choctaws in Mississippi are in a forlorn plight. They represent that element which refused to accompany the larger part of the tribe when removed by the Government in 1831–1833 to Indian Territory under the treaty of 1830. Under the fourteenth article of this treaty the privilege of remaining and taking land was reserved for those who saw fit to conform to its requirements, and three thousand or more remained; but through misconduct on the part of representatives of the Government and the violence and fraud resorted to by white men who coveted the lands hardly any of them secured the reserves to which they were entitled. The pressure on the Government from the people of Mississippi to secure the removal of the Indians was so great that it continued its efforts to transfer the remaining Choctaws to their country west, and their emigration was in progress during most of the years from 1837 to 1855. In 1855, when the removal policy was abandoned, there were possibly 2,500 of the Indians east of the Mississippi, in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana.

Under the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stat. L., 295), provision was made for the "identification" of Mississippi Choctaws claiming descent from ancestors who complied with the fourteenth article of the Choctaw treaty; and in the Choctaw-Chickasaw agreement, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 641), it was provided that persons so identified should remove to and make settlement in the Choctaw-Chickasaw country in Indian Territory within six months from date of identification. Representatives of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes visited the State of Mississippi and proceeded with the work of identification. No provision at that time had been made for transportation of the Indians to the Choctaw-Chickasaw country or for their subsistence after they arrived there; neither was there any provision, financial or administrative, for locating them on particular tracts of land. Subsequently Congress appropriated $20,000 to aid in the removal of Mississippi Choctaws, which was expended by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and a relatively small number of those identified were transported west and subsisted for a short time in Indian Territory out of this fund.

The majority of those who did reach Indian Territory were either transported at the expense of private parties under contracts made with the Indians or removed themselves on their own resources. Several hundred of those who were identified never reached the Indian Territory or made proof of settlement there, and some who were removed, owing to their lack of financial resources, found the conditions they faced in the West worse than those they left and returned to Mississippi. It is fair to presume that many of them did not go because they were unable to secure funds with which to remove. Because the measures meant to be advantageous to the Indians were in some respects inadequate or incomplete they failed to bring the relief that was anticipated.

Racial feeling has been especially strong among those Choctaws who remained in Mississippi. They have not mixed in marriage with the whites or negroes to as great an extent as the Indians who removed to Indian Territory, and the larger part still are full-blood Choctaws. Many are unable to speak the English language, and to find one who can read is a rarity. They have lived in small settlements, holding aloof from white men as much as possible, although employed almost exclusively on the plantations; and in many respects, growing out of this social condition, they have retrograded even from the not very advanced condition of their people as it existed in 1830. Shunning the white men to so great a degree, they have lacked the opportunity of learning business methods and agricultural skill that has been enjoyed by the negroes who were formerly slaves, with the result that they are more undeveloped in business and productive capacity, have lived more poorly, and in the main have sunk to a lower level in every respect than the former slaves and their descendants. After seventy years of separation from the main body of their tribe, they have failed to profit by being surrounded by white men, and have acquired only a smear of civilization. They have shown no disposition to send their children to school, and apparently have not been encouraged to do so. They do not care to mix with the negroes, and it is questionable whether their children would be received in the white schools.

Mr. BYRD is correct in painting them in his speech before the House of Representatives as being in a deplorable condition. They abandoned their tribal brethren and refused through many years to go west, where they might share in the tribal property; but their conduct in that regard grew out of their ignorance and their indisposition through timidity to forsake that with which they were familiar and could endure for new surroundings and new industrial and social conditions, under which they feared they might not be able to succeed. They have no special claim on the Government, unless it be based on the ground that through the misconduct of the government representatives they or their ancestors were deprived of the land in Mississippi to which they were entitled under the treaty, or because as Indians they have a natural right to the protection of the Government. Throughout the last fifty years the office has periodically received petitions for the relief of these Choctaws, but nothing has ever been done, except the opportunity accorded them to go to the Choctaw Nation west.

Under the act of Congress approved February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., 388), as amended February 28, 1891 (26 Stat. L., 794), provision is made for allotting on the public domain Indians who abandon the tribal status, and it is the privilege of such Indians to take advantage of that law; but the Choctaws are so situated financially and so entirely lacking in the intelligence necessary to set up an independent establishment that it is questionable whether any measures the Government might take toward making possible their settlement under that law would be of real advantage to them. Certainly this law could not be made beneficial unless very careful supervision were maintained over them for at least a generation. These Indians have no skill in any agricultural pursuit except cotton raising, and the Government has no public lands available within the cotton-growing States.

Another solution of the problem might be the purchase from the unallotted lands of the Choctaws and Chickasaws of a sufficient tract to settle them in Oklahoma, where they would be able to come in contact with the more intelligent members of their tribe, and this would also necessitate an expenditure of considerable money and the supervision of their affairs for some time to come. The only other solution that occurs to me would be the purchase of lands for these Indians in Mississippi, where they would be surrounded by the conditions under which they have always lived, so that they may own their lands and maintain their own establishments.

I shall certainly be glad to do anything in my power to aid in a solution of this difficult problem.

Very respectfully,

F. E. LEUPP,
Commissioner.

Mr. Chairman, on the first day of this Congress I introduced a bill, No. 122, authorizing the defendants in one of the court citizenship cases to appeal from said citizenship court to the Supreme Court of the United States. The preamble of the bill explains fully the reasons and necessity for the passage of the measure, and is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 122) to provide for an appeal of one case from the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Whereas under the act of Congress of June 10, 1896, the Commission of the United States to the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians (known as the "Dawes Commission") was authorized and empowered to hear, pass upon, and determine the application of all persons claiming to be members of either of said tribes and whose right to citizenship had been denied by the tribe, and granted to the tribe, or person claiming citizenship therein, the right of appeal to the United States courts in the Indian Territory from the decision of said commission, if it or he was aggrieved thereby, and provided that the judgments of saidcourts should be final (20 Stat., p. 339); and

Whereas many persons did apply to said commission to be identified and enrolled by said commission as members of one of said tribes and many of them, as well as said tribes, did appeal to said United States courts aforesaid from the decisions of said commission and obtained and caused to be rendered and entered final judgments in accordance with the provisions of said act of June 10, 1896; and

Whereas under an act of Congress of July 1, 1898, the tribe against whom final judgments had been obtained in said United States courts, and the persons whose claims to citizenship had been denied by said courts, were granted an appeal from the final decisions of said courts directly to the Supreme Court of the United States (30 Stat., p. 591); and

Whereas the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, under the terms of said last-named act did appeal from the judgments rendered by said United States courts against them, respectively, to the said Supreme Court; and whereas all of said judgments so appealed from were by the said Supreme Court affirmed and held to be final (Stephens et al. v. Cherokee Nation et al., 174 U. S., p. 1041, law edition); and

Whereas under an act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes." Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, chapter 1362, page 646, a court was created and designated as the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court; and whereas in section 31 of said act it is recited, "It being claimed and insisted by the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations that the United States courts in the Indian Territory, acting under the act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, have admitted persons to citizenship or to enrollment as such citizens in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, without notice of the proceedings in said courts being given to each of said nations; and it being insisted by said nations that in such proceedings notice to each of said nations was indispensable, and it being claimed and insisted by said nations that the proceedings in the United States courts in the Indian Territory under the act of June 10, 1896, should have been confined to a review of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, upon the papers and evidence submitted to said commission, and should not have extended to a tribe de novo of the question of citizenship, and it being desirable to finally determine these questions, the two nations, jointly, or either of said nations acting saparately and making the other a party defendant, may, within ninety days after this agreement becomes effective, by a bill in equity filed in the Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court hereinafter named, seek the annulment and vacation of all such decisions by said courts. Ten persons so admitted to citizenship or enrollment by said courts, with notice to one, but not to both, of said nations, shall be made defendants to said suit as representatives of the entire class of persons similarly situated, the number of such persons being too numerous to require all of them to be made individual parties to the suit, but any person so situated may, upon his application, be made a party defendant to the suit. Notice of the institution of said suit shall be personally served upon the chief executive of the defendant nation, if either nation be made a party defendant as aforesaid, and upon each of said ten representative defendants, and shall also be published for a period of four weeks in at least two weekly newspapers having general circulation in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. * * * Said suit shall be determined at the earliest practicable time, shall be confined to a final determination of the questions of law here named, and shall be without prejudice to the determination of any charge or claim that the admission of such persons to citizenship or enrollment by said United States courts in the Indian Territory was wrongfully obtained, as provided in the next section;" and

Whereas under the terms of section 31 of said act of July 1, 1902, the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations filed in said citizenship court, at South McAlester, Ind. T., their petition in equity against J. T. Riddle, D. S. Riddle, L. A. Riddle, Elizabeth Casey, John Casey, Andrew B. Hite, L. T. Hill, James W. Balthrop, T. D. Arnold, and J. H. Bratcher, for themselves and as representatives of all persons similarly situated, who had established their right to citizenship in either the Choctaw or Chickasaw nations by obtaining judgments in said United States courts, as provided under act of June 10, 1896, and sought the vacation and cancellation of all such judgments rendered by said United States courts, because of the two questions of law named in section 31 of said act of July 1, 1902, said cause in said citizenship court being entitled, styled, and numbered "The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, or tribes of Indians, v. J. T. Riddle et al., No. 1;" and

Whereas on the 17th day of December, 1902, said citizenship court rendered and caused to be entered in said cause a judgment wherein it held and decided—

First. "That notice to each of said Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, or tribes of Indians, of the proceedings of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, acting under the act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, admitting persons to citizenship, or to enrollment as such citizens, in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, was indispensable."

Second. "That in said proceedings in the United States courts in the Indian Territory said courts proceeded to hear and determine said causes de novo."

"That by reason of each of said facts, to wit, that the proceedings in said United States courts were had without notice to each of said tribes or nations when notice to each of said nations was indispensable, and that said United States courts tried said causes de novo when their action should have been confined to a review of the action of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes upon the papers and evidence submitted to such commission, all of said proceedings, decrees, and decisions of said United States courts in the Indian Territory admitting any and all persons to citizenship or enrollment as such citizens in said nations or tribes of Indians, or either of them, ought to be set aside, annulled, and vacated." And "Ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all of said judgments, decrees, and decisions rendered by the United States courts in the Indian Territory, acting under the act of Congress approved June 10, 1896, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrollment as such citizens in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, upon appeal from the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, in favor of the ten defendants named in the bill in this proceeding, as well as to those who have come in and made themselves parties thereto, and the judgments rendered as aforesaid in favor of all persons similarly situated are set aside, annulled, vacated, and held for naught;" and

Whereas under the law the decision of the said citizenship court has resulted in decitizenizing about 3,000 persons, whose right or claim to Choctaw or Chickasaw citizenship had been adjudicated by the United States courts in the Indian Territory in accordance with the act of Congress of June 10, 1896, and in striking their names from the roll of citizenship of said tribes prepared by the Dawes Commission, and has resulted in the destruction of the property rights of such persons in good faith acquired after the rendition of said judgments so attempted to be canceled; and

Whereas it is contended by such persons that the said decision of said citizenship court is invalid, and upon appeal to a competent court of appeals upon review would be reversed for the following reasons:

First. Because said section 31 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, was an attempt on the part of the legislative branch of the Government to vacate, cancel, and annul final decrees of a court of competent jurisdiction, and because at the date of the passage of said act both the questions of law in said section named had been submitted to, passed upon, and adjudicated by courts of competent jurisdiction in a controversy between the same parties.

Second. Because when the said act of July 1, 1902, was passed, and when the decision of said citizenship court was rendered, the Supreme Court of the United States had passed upon and decided the two questions of law named in said act in the case of Stephens and others v. Cherokee Nation and others (174 U. S., 339, bottom of page, law edition) adverse to the holding and decision of said citizenship court.

Third. Because said section 31 of said act is class legislation and discriminates between persons exactly in the same status, in that according to the terms thereof persons admitted to citizenship by the Dawes Commission with notice to one and not both said nations are unaffected thereby, whereas upon appeal from said commission to the United States courts notice to both of said nations was required according to the tenor and effect of the decision of said citizenship court.

Fourth. Because said citizenship court had not the power in an action in personam to set aside judgments in favor of persons not parties to said test suit without naming such persons in the bill in equity filed and causing them to be personally served with process.

Fifth. Because in the determination of Indian citizenship no property right, but the status only of the person, is involved, as has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the cases of Roff v. Burney (168 U. S., 442, bottom of page, law ed.), Stephens v. Cherokee Nation (174 U. S., 1041, bottom of page, law ed.), Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock (187 U. S., 184, bottom of page, law ed.), Lone Wolf v. Hitchcock (187 U. S., 299, bottom of page, law ed.).

Sixth. Because since the year 1855 the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations have maintained separate and distinct political autonomies, the one in no way depending upon the other in the management of its political or governmental affairs, and because at no time in the history of said tribes has the Choctaw Nation acted with or assumed the right to act with the Chickasaw Nation in inquiring into, passing upon, and determining the citizenship or membership of said tribe, and vice versa. (Treaty of 1855, 11 Stats., p. 611, arts. 4, 5, 6, and 7; const. of the Chickasaw Nation.)

Now, therefore, to the end that the rights of such persons to citizenship may be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction, and to the end that the decision of said citizenship court may be reviewed by such court,

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who is a party to said test suit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations or tribes of Indians v. J. T. Riddle and others, as aforesaid, as one of the original ten defendants, or who has made himself a party thereto, or whose claim to citizenship was affected by the decision of said Choctaw and Chickasaw citizenship court as aforesaid, is hereby granted and allowed an appeal from said cause in said court directly to the Supreme court of the United States, and said cause by said Supreme Court shall be advanced upon its docket and set down for hearing at as early a day as is practicable. There shall be but one appeal from said cause, in which all persons as aforesaid may join, and the same shall be allowed, prosecuted, and determined as appeals in civil cases from the United States court of said may join, and the same shall be allowed, prosecuted, and determined, except that the amount or value of the matter, thing, or question involved shall in no way affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court: Provided, nevertheless, That said appeal herein provided for shall be perfected within six months from the date of the passage and approval of this act.

SEC. 2. That in passing on and determining the two questions of law hereinbefore mentioned the Supreme Court may consider all of the laws, customs, and usages of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, with reference to the admission of persons to citizenship or enrollment in either of said nations, and to that end, upon application, it may require the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Commission of the United States to the Five Civilized Tribes, or any of their subordinates, or officers of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, or the chief executive of either of said nations to furnish certified copies of any record, decision, ruling, or opinion applying or referring to the said questions. All notices or process necessary to perfect the appeal herein provided for shall be served upon the chief executive of the Choctaw Nation and the Chickasaw Nation, respectively, or upon the attorneys of record for said nations in said cause appealed from.

SEC. 3. That pending said appeal and the decision of the Supreme Court thereon all the rights of the appellants therein shall remain unimpaired and shall in no way be affected by the decision of any court whatsoever.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and that this act take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, like the resolution I have referred to, has never been reported to this House, and I fear it never will be reported. But I indulge the hope that the Sixty-first Congress will refuse to close the rolls of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians until every Indian is enrolled, and full and complete justice will thus be done our Indian wards.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Texas to make the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I should say that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, the point of order has been re-formed so as to cut out some extra words which are a duplication.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understood the gentleman from Illinois made the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I withdrew the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to re-report the amendment. There was a duplication of words as it was first handed up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 19, page 43:
"And the Secretary of the Interior is directed to so disburse this appropriation as to complete said work by July 1, 1910."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse Dr. G. W. Harkins, of Coalgate, Okla., for services rendered and expenses incurred in suppressing the spread of smallpox in Indian Territory from June 30, 1901, to August 8, 1901, $634.15, the same to be accepted by said Dr. G. W. Harkins in full payment of all demand for such services and expenses.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph and ask the gentleman whether these services were rendered by direction of any of the officials of the Indian Department?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; they were rendered by direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For permanent annuity for support of light horsemen, per thirteenth article of treaty of October 18, 1820, and thirteenth article of treaty of June 22, 1855, $600.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask whether there is any appropriation in this bill carried for the support of heavy horsemen. We have a new administration coming in, and the distinguished chairman of the Indian Committee is a part of it; and it seems to me that it is a discrimination to carry an appropriation for the support of light horsemen when we all know that both the gentleman and his running mate are heavy horsemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated here that the administration intended to use automobiles and abandon horses.

Mr. MANN. What I am referring to is the discrimination between the character of light horsemen and heavy horsemen.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will state that at the time this agreement was entered into the distinguished heavy-weight gentlemen who are to be inaugurated on the 4th of March were not in existence, and that may account for applying the provision of the treaty only to light horsemen rather than heavy horsemen.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SALEM SCHOOL.

For support and education of 600 Indian pupils at the Indian school, Salem, Oreg., and for pay of superintendent, $102,200;
For general repairs and improvements, $10,000;
In all, $112,200.
For general incidental expenses of the Indian Service in Oregon, including traveling expenses of agents, and support and civilization of Indians of Grande Ronde and Siletz agencies, $3,000;
Pay of employees at the same agencies, $3,000;
In all, $6,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 15, and before line 16, on page 47, the following:
"Siletz Indian Reservation: That within one year from the date of the approval of this act any religious or missionary society now occupying, under proper authority, for religious or educational work among the Indians, any lands of the Siletz Reservation in Oregon, shall have the right to purchase 10 acres of land on said reservation, or a less quantity, at the option of the purchaser, at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and the same shall be conveyed to such religious or missionary society by patent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if such school is disposed of as above authorized at any time during the fiscal year of 1910 the pro rata share only of the appropriation for the maintenance of said school for the portion of the year which the school is maintained by the United States shall be available.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, it was my purpose to have made some remarks under general debate on this bill on this subject of reservation and nonreservation schools, but the consumption of the entire time that was expected to have been taken in general debate to-day in other ways made that impossible. At this late hour I will not attempt to enter into a lengthy discussion of the question, but I may say, while it is well known that the views of the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs are not in favor of the continuance of the system of nonreservation schools, and while with most of the plans of the present commissioner for the general education and improvement of the Indians I quite agree, to this one proposition I am not able to bring my concurrence. The truth is, I believe the nonreservation school, considering the fact that the ultimate purpose and obligation on the part of the Government is the civilization of the Indian so that he can be placed in a position where he can support himself and become in some measure a citizen of the United States, bearing that in view, I believe the nonreservation school is to-day the strongest single civilizing force standing between the blanket Indian and barbarism.

We have always had an Indian problem. When our forefathers landed at Jamestown and Plymouth our Indian problem began, and it will continue at least for some generations to come. No great public question is really settled until it is settled right. The Indian question can only be settled by the civilization of the Indian.

It would be anomalous and unthinkable that we should tolerate permanently within the boundaries of States and the Nation large bodies of people who have nothing in common, politically or industrially, with the balance of our people. The Indian must therefore be prepared for citizenship; and when prepared, the responsibilities of citizenship must be placed upon him.

The Indian must be advanced to civilization by the same means that have lifted up all races of men—hard work and education. The ministry of toil is the best antidote for indolence and barbarism. Able-bodied Indians should either work or starve. This is the settled policy at the Indian Bureau as now administered. We are helping the Indian most when we are teaching him to help himself. Our present commissioner has been specially successful and thorough in his efforts to make the Indian industrious and self-reliant, and thorough also in his promotion of Indian education.

Real progress is being made, and no period of like duration has seen so great progress, particularly in the West, as the past four years. While speaking in praise of the general work of the Indian Office, I am equally positive that the commissioner's often-expressed purpose to close out our nonreservation schools, if carried into execution, would not be for the best good of the Indian nor of the States containing the Indian population. Abandon these schools, and we would retrograde at least a decade in the final solution of the Indian problem.

I desire to submit here the views of one who has been for many years in the Indian Service as inspector, teacher of reservation schools, and superintendent of nonreservation schools. He has had exceptional opportunities for studying the education question in all of its phases. The commissioner requested him to place his views in writing, and I am permitted to present a portion of his communication as bearing upon this question:

In a general view of Indian education, as seen by one who has had many years of experience, not only in observation, but in actual work and contact, there appears many features of the work which are encouraging and promising, and, on the other hand, there have been and are at present many things to discourage and dishearten those who may be active in the work.

I will say that, under certain conditions and with suitable employees, I believe that a reservation day school is capable of accomplishing more for the money expended than any other school in the Indian Service. But I am sorry to say, in this connection, that the changing conditions and the lack of suitable employees to conduct these little institutions of learning have resulted apparently in lessening very materially the scope of their influence. Eight or ten pupils, poorly supplied with clothing, with little or nothing to eat a good portion of the time, dirty in their homes, and not presentable in their personal appearance in school, are not very inspiring to the average teacher who attempts to instruct them, and there is apt to arise a condition of indifference and the child comes to school and returns to its home, and it would be hard to determine just what has been gained, if anything.

Then there comes the reservation boarding school, which, in many respects, should be able to perform just as good service as the nonreservation school; but there are conditions surrounding these institutions that have a retarding influence. The employees are isolated in many instances, and there is apt to grow up a condition of narrowness and lack of interest. This often results in frequent changes in the employee force, and it would seem in some instances that when an employee received an appointment to a reservation school the first thing sought for was a transfer, and in many instances it would seem for the good of the school that the transfer be granted.

As an illustration of this fact, there was one reservation school to my knowledge of a capacity for 60 pupils that has perhaps had more changes in its employee force in one year than a nonreservation school with which I am familiar has had in four years. It can not be otherwise than a broken and disconcerted effort maintained under such conditions.

The mission schools are in a class by themselves. They are now largely contract schools, and as to what extent the Government has supervision I am not aware. In former years, when my duties took me in contact with these schools, I observed a fair degree of efficiency, though I never conceded the point that such schools were, in the general results, superior to the well organized and conducted government school. In brief, my observation has been that there should be on every reservation a good, thorough, and well-equipped school system, and the only suggestions that I would make along this line is to redouble the effort, energy, and interest in the reservation schools, but at the same time keep open before the child the fact that it can reach out into a broader life if it so desires, and that the nonreservation school can offer opportunities beyond what can be obtained at home.

The nonreservation schools have certainly done a great deal in the general education of these people. It is very difficult for one who has not lived on a reservation for any considerable length of time and who has not tried to see things from the Indian standpoint to realize what a wonderful revelation it must be to the Indian boy or girl who for the first time sees a city or a train or who comes in contact with the outside world.

It is now true that many reservations are being encroached upon by the white man and that many of these features are being brought close to the homes of the Indian. But while this is true, there is an element in this new and rapid advance that is not calculated to elevate the undisciplined mind of the Indian. The living at a nonreservation school for a period of a year, the having of three meals a day, the clean bed, the regular bath, the meeting of a number of employees and teachers and mingling with their own people under proper restrictions, and the ever-present earnest effort of those about them can not help but have an influence on the life to follow. It is also true that reservation schools are not living up to their privilege, and for that matter the whole educational work is undoubtedly below what it should be. This, perhaps, would be the conclusion of every sincere worker, though he may have done all that he knew how to do; yet, after it is over and after the time for work is ended, it is only natural that one can see wherein there might have been improvements. That being the case, it should be the earnest endeavor of everyone in the work to make a study of the existing conditions and be able, in so far as possible, to meet the requirements. In other words, we should all be alive to the needs of the time in which we are working.

The one sad feature of this work is that the results as seen on the reservations are not flattering, to say the least. This apparent failure of many who have had some education is often held up as a reason for condemning the schools, and the question is often asked the nonreservation superintendent: "Do they go back to the old reservation life after they leave here?" My answer invariably is that they do not, and then I explain that no child can remain in my school for a single term, let alone a period of from three to six years, and then return to the reservation and be the same as it would have been had it never gone to school. The young man or woman may not show improvement over those who have not gone to school; they may even be worse in a single instance or exception; but there is an impression made on that mind that can never be erased, and whether there is an improvement or not, the person has a better knowledge of the ways of the world and of right and wrong than it would have had had it remained in ignorance of all these things.

It was at one time my task to make a careful investigation of the lives and conduct of returned students. This was some years ago, and no doubt conditions are somewhat changed at this time. In so far as I can recall, my conclusion was that 15 per cent of persons attending nonreservation schools showed no improvement whatever, though it is possible that in later years there might be manifest some characteristics which would indicate a benefit received at school.

The failure of the young man or woman leaving the nonreservation school is not, in my opinion, due, to any large extent, to the school, but to the conditions to which they return. There seems to be no systematic effort to train or develop the returned pupils. The conditions are such that the person returning to a reservation falls into idleness, and in many instances, there being a living furnished without any effort on the part of the individual, there grows up an extravagance that is very detrimental to progress. The young man who comes into possession of a few hundred dollars feels that he must have a good time, and he spends his money more freely than the white man who might be worth as many thousands; and there seems to be a disposition on the part of many on the reservations, and especially those living around the borders, to encourage the Indian in getting rid of what he has. They encourage him in selling his land, in selling his horses, sheep, and cattle; they encourage him in doing anything that will separate him from his wealth; and there does not seem to be any systematic effort to teach these people to be frugal and provident. I do not know what could be done, but whatever of failure there appears to be with the Indian, it should not be charged to the school nor to the good, honest, conscientious men and women who have given their lives to instruct these people in the right way and who have succeeded, for the time being, at least. When these persons were with them, under their influence, they led them in the ways of right and progress, and then, when their influence is severed, have been unable to control the actions or life of the student. I sincerely believe that whatever there is of success among the young men and women on the reservation is due more largely to the influences that have been exerted by their teachers and matrons and other employees of the school than any other single force that could be mentioned.

As to the Chamberlain School, I have been ready as a member of the committee to concur in this particular plan, from the fact I believe these nonreservation as well as the reservation schools should be distinctively industrial schools. One of two things ought to be done in regard to the Chamberlain School. Either it should have larger areas of land, greater facilities for industrial education, or to do what we have done with it. Upon the remaining nonreservation schools in our State the Government has already made good provision of sufficient land and facilities to teach the Indian youth industries under similar climatic conditions with which they will be met when they work out their destiny after they return to their people.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it would be well to discontinue such schools as Hampton, Va., Carlisle, Pa., and schools hundreds of miles away from the Indian reservation, on the ground, as the gentleman has stated, of climate which causes pulmonary diseases and others.

Mr. MARTIN. So far as disease is concerned, and so far as the merits of each particular school is concerned, I think these are not specially dependent upon proximity to or remoteness from the reservations. As to the expense or economy, I admit that is an important question. I will say, more directly in answer to the gentleman's question, that I think the nearer the nonreservation schools can be to the reservation from which the Indian pupils come, other things being equal, the better. I think that the nonreservation schools at long distances from the reservations ought to be considerably improved as to their methods and the attention that is given the pupil in order to prepare him for the particular work he has to do in the future——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that——

Mr. MARTIN. And if I had the time——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And is it not a fact that most of the children in your State which attend Indian schools have parents who are voters, and some of them holding office?

Mr. MARTIN. Not in my State. A very small percentage of children of voting parents attend these nonreservation schools.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that while the reservation schools have some advantages and should be continued, unfortunately the Indian parent, as well as the Indian student, kept exclusively upon the reservation, and considering the character of the white people that go to those reservations for the purpose of speculation and profit upon the ignorance and out of the property of the Indians, view necessarily the problem of civilization as represented in the white population in its most unfavorable aspect. Where the nonreservation schools are near the reservation and it is the habit of the parents to take their children in their own conveyances to the schools, they come in contact with the white population from a better view point and get a better opportunity to observe the elements of civilization. Education and progress are as much, indeed more, a matter of example than of precept, and I think under this nonreservation school system in close proximity to the reservation the Indian has his best view of the white population instead of continually seeing it in its worst aspect.

No people advance more rapidly than their ideals. Ideals of home and comfort can only be formed by observation and contact with like conditions. The student on the reservation sees few examples of thrift and progress. In the nonreservation schools the girls may be employed in near-by houses and many become good domestic servants. Athletics, in competition with high schools and colleges, are a most wholesome influence.

When the last reservation is abandoned and the unallotted lands have become the homes of thrifty settlers and the sites of cities and towns, then civilization will have come to the Indian; but until that is done I believe that Congress ought to liberally support the nonreservation schools, particularly those which are close to the reservation, as affording the best opportunity that the Indian student and the Indian parent now have to observe the example of civilization in one of its most inspiring demonstrations.

The time of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN] having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted one minute more.

Mr. CARTER. Suppose we do away with the nonreservation schools; as there are not enough reservation schools to care for the Indians there at present, what method does the gentleman propose to follow in order to care for these children who are now attending the nonreservation schools?

Mr. MARTIN. I would not abandon them. I think they should be retained and improved; but I am here to say, as I regard the Indian problem, as it has come under my own observation in the West, in its educational phases, I doubt very much whether we could continue this plan of closing nonreservation schools without a very serious impairment of our educational system. My own view is that we ought to retain both the reservation and nonreservation schools.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk resumed and continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that on page 51, in line 4, after the word "sixty" there be inserted the word "eight," so as to read "sixty-eight thousand;" and in lines 6 and 7, on the same page, to strike out the words "at seven agencies."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in engrossing the bill the Clerk make such corrections in the totals as are found necessary by reason of the changes that have been made by amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I see an error on page 36, line 5, in the spelling of a name. It ought to be "Cynthia Ann Parker" instead of "Cynthia Parker."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 26916) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the vote will be taken on the amendments in gross.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1909.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Edward E. Hale.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, in accordance with the notice given last night, I ask that the naval appropriation bill be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reserved was reserved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and is the amendment on page 60, relative to the Marine Corps. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 6, after the word "dollars," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein made for the Marine Corps shall be expended for the purposes for which said appropriations are made unless officers and enlisted men shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships and armored cruisers, and also upon such other vessels of the navy as the President may direct, in detachments of not less than 8 per cent of the strength of the enlisted men of the navy on said vessels.

Mr. HALE. Notice was given, instead of remaining longer last night in session, that the Senate would be asked to proceed at once to the consideration of the bill this morning. But the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is not present. One or two Senators suggested that they would desire to debate some of these amendments. If any Senator desires to do so, and is ready, I wish, for the convenience of the Senator who is absent, that he would proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggested last evening that I wanted to submit some observations to the Senate upon this amendment. I am quite ready to proceed, but it is evident the Senate is not ready to proceed.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that while full notice was given I shall not attempt to proceed to take questions by votes until Senators have time to reach the Chamber. I merely suggested that if any Senator desires to debate the amendment and is ready now the time may be so occupied. But I do not ask the Senator in this thin condition of the Senate to even do that. I do not want to make the suggestion, but a roll call of the Senate would give Senators an opportunity to come in. I suggest to the Senator whether it might not be well to have a roll call of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was about to suggest the absence of a quorum, and yet I did not want to do it unless it is necessary. I have some hope that what I have to say will influence the minds of some of the Senators upon the question, and therefore I naturally desire that they shall hear what I have to say. In order to make sure of an audience of that character, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HALE. Before the roll call begins, I ask the Sergeant-at-Arms to notify Senators in committee rooms that there is a call of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Dixon	Kittredge	Piles
Bankhead	Dolliver	Lodge	Platt
Borah	du Pont	Long	Rayner
Bourne	Elkins	McCreary	Scott
Briggs	Flint	McCumber	Simmons
Bulkeley	Frye	McLaurin	Smoot
Burnham	Fulton	Martin	Stone
Burrows	Gallinger	Milton	Taliaferro
Carter	Gamble	Money	Teller
Clapp	Guggenheim	Nelson	Warner
Cummins	Hale	Overman	Warren
Depew	Hansbrough	Page
Dick	Heyburn	Penrose
Dillingham	Kean	Perkins

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I earnestly hope that no Senator will believe that my insistence upon and with regard to this amendment arises out of any hostility toward the naval appropriation bill. I know better than I ever knew before the extent of the labor undergone by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have witnessed the marvelous patience of the chairman of the committee, who through two or three days has by his luminous explanations made clear many things that before were obscure and mysterious, and I congratulate him most heartily upon the toleration he has exhibited in the midst of the crossfire of questions concerning the items of the bill. That is the reason why I appeal to him and to the Senate not to mar the measure by a provision so unjust and, as I believe, so unconstitutional.

In his explanation yesterday the chairman of the committee indicated the origin of this part of the bill. It did not need his statement to enable Senators to know the origin of this part of the bill. I recognize it, and the country will recognize it, as another attempt upon the part of Congress to correct a mistake of the President of the United States. I recognize it and the country will recognize it as another assault upon Theodore Roosevelt. I hold no commission for the defense of the President of the United States. I bear no such relation toward him as will bias my judgment or create in my mind any prejudice whatsoever. I am not the beneficiary of any influence exerted by the President of the United States. But my sense of justice will not permit me to allow this matter to pass without venturing the prediction that the mistakes of Theodore Roosevelt will pass away from the memory of men. I suppose he has made some mistakes. If he has not, he is far from a fit associate of the men of his time. But any man who does much will commit mistakes. It is only the man who does nothing who is free from error in this world of ours.

It seems to me that we owe it to another department of the Government to look with exceeding care into this provision. The people of the country from which I come love the President of the United States. They are unfamiliar with the atmosphere which reeks with criticism and censure. They admire a man who is resolute enough and courageous enough to grapple with the problems of these times with all the strength of a strong and resolute man. And they believe that when the history of this decade is written, when in future times the historian will record the deeds of these days, Theodore Roosevelt will be the towering figure of his age.

They believe that he has done more to awaken the public conscience, more to exalt the standards of public duty, more to enforce the true conception of public fidelity than any man of his time. Coming from such a constituency, it ought not to be thought strange that I desire to stand for a brief time in opposition to a provision of this bill which, as I interpret it, is intended as a rebuke to him.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I shall not let any statement of that kind pass unnoticed. It has come to a very hard pass if, in its discretion over the management of the large concerns of the Navy Department, a department for which Congress appropriates one hundred and thirty-odd million, in the regulation and procedure of an important part of that department Congress can not restore a condition that has existed for a hundred years and pass a measure that is against an order of the President without having it considered as an assault upon him.

I deny here in terms, and I hope I deny it for the Senate, the right of any Senator to take such ground and to arraign Congress and to declare that it is intended as and its purpose is an assault upon the Chief Executive. It is simply Congress exercising its natural control, which certainly is equal to the control the President has over the Navy Department.

With this disclaimer, I leave the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not impute to the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the purpose which he disclaims. I endeavored in the very outset to indicate the origin of this provision in the bill. I believe it to have been inspired originally with that purpose, and in what I am about to say I believe I can establish the proposition.

What is the situation? I assume that at this time the President of the United States has not violated any law of the land. It does appear that a short while ago he issued an executive order gradually withdrawing the Marine Corps from certain ships. He issued that order with the approval of every commander of a battle ship in active service, as I am informed, save three. He issued it under the approval of Admiral Evans, of Admiral Sperry, of Admiral Swinburne, of the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and of the Secretary of the Navy.

Thereupon this matter comes into Congress. If Congress had attempted to establish a rule for the government of the land and naval forces directly, I would not have made the assertion I made a few moments ago. I do not intend at this time to attempt to add to the argument presented yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with respect to the merits of the proposition. I shall pass quickly to another phase of the subject. But I do desire to call the attention of the Senate to the opinion of Rear-Admiral Evans. It is all summed up in this statement, and I am now reading from the testimony before the House committee:

> Admiral EVANS. Well, sir, my opinion is that the marines should be removed from all ships in the navy, except the transports fitted for carrying the marines. I give that opinion after studying the question very thoroughly and after having served with the marines in pretty nearly every kind of service, but I want this committee to understand that I have not a word to say against the marines.

I beg also to quote a single sentence from the letter of Admiral Dewey. I shall not read his argument, but simply his conclusion:

> As a consequence, I firmly believe that the efficiency of both the Navy and Marine Corps will be materially increased by restricting the marines to the very important and necessary duties enumerated in Executive Order No. 969.

This testimony seems to be corroborated by substantially every man upon whom we must depend to fight our ships, in the event that the contingency should arise for which the ships were built and set afloat.

I would therefore simply, as a matter of policy, feel very reluctant to overrule the judgment of these officers of the navy, this department, this bureau of the Navy Department, the Secretary of the Navy, and the President of the United States, believing that their judgment is better than my judgment upon so technical a military affair as is presented in this subject.

However, I did not rise to debate the merits, as a policy, of the proposal to withdraw the Marine Corps from the ships of war. I arose to call the attention of the Senate to the invasion which I believe is found in this amendment upon the prerogatives and the powers and the privileges of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

I desire, first, to read the extract from the Constitution, referred to yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. Section 2 of Article II of the Constitution of the United States begins:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States.

A subdivision of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution declares that—

The Congress shall have power—

* * * * * * *

To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

We have before us at this moment for interpretation these provisions of the Constitution: First, the appointment of the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; second, the power of Congress to make rules for the government and the regulation of the land and naval forces.

I do not know anything about the legislative history of the Senate or Congress. I do not know what it has done with respect to similar or cognate matters. Therefore I shall not attempt to cite precedents. But I do know something about the Constitution of the United States, for I have spent twenty-five years of my life in the attempt to apply it to the actual affairs of human life; I do know something about the meaning of the ordinary words of my mother tongue; and I do believe that the provision now under consideration, the amendment which has been proposed to the Senate by the Committee of the Whole, is not only unjust, but I believe it to be in contravention of this fundamental law of the land.

I did not make the assertion yesterday against which the Senator from Maryland brought to bear all the great powers of his learning. I did not assert the proposition against which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON] brought his profound studies of the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. FULTON. In what respect, I ask the Senator, does he contend that I misquoted him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not contend that you misquoted me at all. You misunderstood me; that is all.

Mr. FULTON. The statement I made was that the Senator contended, as I understood him, that this proposed amendment was an intrenchment of the constitutional power of the President as Commander in Chief, and hence in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did.

Mr. FULTON. I understand the Senator to reaffim that this morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did so contend. That is not, however, the proposition.

Mr. FULTON. It seems I did not misunderstand or misquote the proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not the proposition to which the Senator from Oregon directed his argument. I will come presently to the distinction, and I think it will be perfectly obvious.

Inasmuch, however, as the question has been raised by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Oregon as to the power of the Senate to make the substance of this provision a rule or a regulation of the army and the navy, I am quite willing to assume the responsibility for the proposition as understood by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Oregon.

I do not question the right and power of Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the army and the navy, but addressing myself in the first instance to the proposition suggested by the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Oregon, I beg to submit this observation: Assume that this provision was a direct command upon the Commander in Chief not to remove the Marine Corps from the war ships of the navy; assume that it was a plain and an explicit direction to the Commander in Chief that a certain proportion of the Marine Corps shall be employed upon the war ships; then the question raised by the Senator from Maryland and the question supplemented by the Senator from Oregon would be before us for discussion. This is not such a direction; it is not such a rule.

I suppose that there must be somewhere between two great extremes the line which separates the power of the President and the power of Congress. I fancy that there is not a Senator in this Chamber who would insist that Congress could pass a law which would declare that the President of the United States should issue no command, no direction to the army and navy, until it was approved by Congress. I would like to ask these distinguished Senators whether they believe that Congress could adopt a rule—it must, of course, be in the form of a statute—that would prohibit the Commander in Chief from issuing any order, any command, any direction, without first submitting it to Congress for its approval? I do not ask an answer to that question now. I do not know that you would care to give the answer at any time, because I am sure you will at once disclaim any such interpretation of this clause of the Constitution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Merely for information, Mr. President, I want to inquire of the Senator if Congress did not practically do that with Andrew Johnson by a two-thirds vote in both Houses?

Mr. CUMMINS. My answer to the Senator from South Carolina is this: As I said a few moments ago, I am not familiar, as you are, with the technical proceedings in Congress and what Congress has done; but I repeat to you, as I said a moment ago, while I am not and have not been a student of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I have been a student of the Constitution of the United States. I know something about that instrument; and the validity of this legislation is to be tested not by what Congress did in the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, but what it has the power to do under the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. Gladly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he can see any distinction in principle between the amendment proposed by the committee and the following sections, which I read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be employed on board each of the said ships of 44 guns, 1 captain, 4 lieutenants, 1 lieutenant of marines, 1 chaplain, 1 surgeon, and 2 surgeon's mates; and in each of the ships of 36 guns, 1 captain, 3 lieutenants, 1 lieutenant of marines, 1 surgeon, and 1 surgeon's mate, who shall be appointed and commissioned in like manner as other officers of the United States are.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the crews of each of the said ships of 44 guns shall consist of 150 seamen, 103 midshipmen and ordinary seamen, 1 sergeant, 1 corporal, 1 drum, 1 fife, and 50 marines; and that the crews of each of the said ships of 36 guns shall consist of 130 able seamen and midshipmen, 90 ordinary seamen, 1 sergeant, 2 corporals, 1 drum, 1 fife, and 40 marines, over and above the officers hereinbefore mentioned. (Stat. L., vol. 1, p. 350.)

The act of Congress provided that there shall be employed these specified officials and the specified number from the different corps, one being 50 men from the Marine Corps. Does the Senator see any distinction between the provisions I have just read and the amendment proposed? I will say to the Senator that I can see no distinction; and this is an act which was passed in 1794, when they were pretty familiar with what the Constitution meant.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, there is the same difference between the act to which the Senator from Oregon has just referred and the amendment now under consideration that there is between a law and a threat.

Mr. FULTON. Does the Senator not think this would be a law should it be incorporated in the pending measure and be passed by Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has the form of law, I answer the Senator. In some respects it is a law.

Mr. FULTON. If not in violation of the Constitution, would it not be a law?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will come immediately to the question which the Senator from Oregon has asked and differentiate the pending amendment from the law he has just read.

As I was about to say, if this provision were in the form of a direction or a command it would still be subject to very grave doubt. To illustrate it, I take the question propounded to me yesterday by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. He asked me if Congress might not declare by a law that no troops shall be quartered in the District of Columbia. I answered that question in the affirmative, although I believe it presses dangerously near the line.

My distinction, however, is easily observable when I present another illustration. Suppose Congress were to declare by law that the President of the United States should not quarter a certain regiment in the District of Columbia; suppose it were to declare that the President should not bring any part of the Marine Corps into the District of Columbia. If it should unwisely pass to that point, then I believe it would have contravened its constitutional right and invaded the prerogatives of the Commander in Chief. This illustration will serve to show my view of the real limit of the power of the Congress with regard to this matter.

I am not venturing this opinion without the support of many distinguished authorities; but those authorities will be submitted to the Senate at a later time by my friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], for I did not really intend to discuss the question propounded by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] or by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON]. Granting all that you contend for your construction of the Constitution, yet in the adoption of this amendment under consideration we are passing far beyond our power. It is not a direction to the President; it is not a command; it is not a rule; it is not a regulation of either the army or the navy.

This leads me to a rereading of this provision in order that you may have it fairly in your minds. I am sure that the Senate does not and can not approve this manner of attempting to interfere with the movements of our troops. It says:

Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein made for the Marine Corps shall be expended for the purposes for which said appropriations are made unless officers and enlisted men shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships and armored cruisers, and also upon such other vessels of the navy as the President may direct, in detachments of not less than 8 per cent of the strength of the enlisted men of the navy on said vessels.

Is that a rule for the government of the army or the navy? Is that a regulation of our land or naval forces? To whom is this command given? To whom is this direction extended? It is a command directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, and it says to him, "You shall not expend the money for the pay of the Marine Corps unless the Marine Corps is employed in the manner specified in the provision."

Mr. McLAURIN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. With pleasure.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does the Senator hold that that provision of the appropriation bill is unconstitutional?

Mr. CUMMINS. The provision which I have just read?

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does the Senator not believe that it is within the power of the Congress of the United States to make an appropriation with a condition attached to it?

Mr. CUMMINS: It depends wholly upon the condition. The condition must be valid if it is to effectually protect or affect the appropriation.

Mr. McLAURIN. Suppose, Mr. President, Congress makes a conditional appropriation; is the appropriation void unless the condition can be performed?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall not be tempted into the discussion of that question. If there were no constitutional provision giving command of the army and the navy to the President of the United States, it may be that the consequences suggested by the Senator from Mississippi would necessarily follow, but my suggestion is that this provision is in conflict with the constitutional power of the command of the army and navy by the President of the United States. The President is given by the Constitution the power to command the army and the navy, and there can be imposed upon him whatever rule or regulation Congress sees fit to create that does not deprive him of the power to command.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Gladly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is there any obligation on Congress to organize an army or a navy at all? Suppose Congress, in its judgment and discretion, were to conclude that there were no necessity for an army or a navy in time of peace; has Congress that power?

Mr. CUMMINS. Assuredly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then Congress has the power to make an appropriation for an army and a navy or not in its discretion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think no one will question that, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then, if Congress has power to make such an appropriation, it has power to make it absolutely or upon condition?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree, Mr. President, to the last proposition. You might easily attach to this appropriation bill a score of rules and regulations as conditions that would infringe some provision of the Constitution, and is it the opinion of the Senator from Mississippi that as a condition attached to an appropriation bill you can validly repeal or infringe upon any other provision of the Constitution?

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not believe that Congress can validly infringe upon any provision of the Constitution, either directly or indirectly; but one of the provisions of the Constitution is that all appropriations shall be made by Congress; and nobody else, no other power or authority has the right to judge of the necessity for the appropriation. The appropriation can be given or it can be withheld. If it is given, it can be done upon condition. It would be, in my judgment, contrary to reason to say that Congress has the absolute power to make or not to make an appropriation, and yet has not the power to make that appropriation conditional.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I understand fully the view of the Senator from Mississippi, and, with the modification which I suggested, I certainly do not quarrel with him. I only furnish him for reflection this suggestion from the Constitution.

Mr. McLAURIN. From what part of the Constitution does the Senator intend to read?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is an article in our Constitution, Article III of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides:

ARTICLE III.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Suppose that you should attach to this appropriation the condition that the Marine Corps should not be paid unless it were quartered upon private citizens in time of peace without their consent. Would you insist that you were then employing the powers that were given to you by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. McLAURIN. Does the Senator from Iowa desire me to answer that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I do not care to have an argument injected into mine.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the Senator will allow me, I will answer the question in a minute—in less than a minute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, such an appropriation as that would be void, because it would be based upon a condition that was itself unconstitutional. The appropriation could not be made with the condition, and the condition could not be imposed because it would be unconstitutional. Therefore, the appropriation itself would be void, and the Secretary of the Treasury would have no right to pay money under it.

Mr. HALE. I was going to put a question to the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CUMMINS. Gladly.

Mr. HALE. When the Senator from Iowa asks what would be done if Congress should make such an appropriation as he describes, I shift it about and suppose a situation more kindred to the present. Supposing, notwithstanding that provision, the President should at some time direct and order troops in contravention of that provision. Does the Senator think that the House of Representatives and the Senate combined could not take action and reverse that order of the President?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt of it, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. That is what we are trying to do now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not only have I no doubt of the proposition of the Senator from Maine, but I think it would be the bounden duty in that event of the House of Representatives to impeach the President, and that it would be the duty of the Senate to convict him.

Mr. HALE. But I do not think Congress would be obliged to resort to impeachment. I think the two Houses could take the matter up under the provisions of the Constitution and pass a measure that would destroy the effect of the President's action against the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to enter upon a discussion of the very curious phase, the possible phase, of military life that might be presented by the case suggested by the Senator from Maine. I am only insisting that this provision is not a rule or regulation for the government of our army and navy. As I was saying when interrupted, it is a command put upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States not to pay the soldiers unless certain conditions exist.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator from Iowa if the effect of such a provision is not a regulation? Does it not operate to regulate the disposition of this corps?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion, Mr. President, it is just the kind of regulation that a sheriff imposes when he puts bracelets or handcuffs upon the wrists of his prisoner. That is the sort of regulation it is.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa concedes, as I understand him now, that Congress may directly provide——

Mr. CUMMINS. On the other hand——

Mr. FULTON. Or require that the Marine Corps shall be disposed of and managed as provided in this bill if Congress did it by a direct provision. Does the Senator not concede that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not so concede. I said if the power was sought to be exercised at all under the Constitution, it ought to be exercised in that way. But I gravely doubt the power of Congress to make this provision in any form whatever. As I suggested, however, the authorities upon that proposition will be submitted to the Senate a little later by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. FULTON. Now, let me ask the Senator this question: Whatever might be or whatever may be his view as to the power of Congress to act directly in the matter, does he not admit that Congress is not required or obliged to make any appropriation whatever; and if it sees fit to make the appropriation for the Marine Corps, it may provide the extent to which it may be used or it may refuse to make any appropriation? Is not that within the competency of Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering the question of the Senator from Oregon categorically, I say no; it is not within the power of Congress—I am speaking now of the rightful power; I am not speaking of its physical power to vote—it is not within the rightful power of Congress to attach any condition that it may see fit to an appropriation bill, even though it might have refused to make any appropriation whatsoever for that subject.

Let me illustrate further, in answer to the Senator from Oregon. What is it you do in attaching this provision? You are fair men, you are candid men, you are fearless men, and what you do you ought to do directly. What are you doing here? You are saying to the President of the United States "Take your choice; either command a Marine Corps unpaid or order these troops upon the ships."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator agree that we could disband the Marine Corps in this bill and refuse to pay them at all?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering the Senator from South Carolina, if he means by that question that Congress has the power to disband the Marine Corps and refuse to make any appropriation for its maintenance, I say "Yes;" just as it could refuse to make any appropriation for the maintenance of any part of the army or any part of the navy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, if Congress provides for a Marine Corps, can the President disband it?

Mr. CUMMINS. As a bald proposition, I do not think he can.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, this is a marine corps. "Marine" means sea; so that these people are organized and paid for sea duty primarily, and if the President, in his wisdom or unwisdom, expects to say to Congress, "I will not put these men on shipboard, but I am going to make a land force entirely of them," why say "marine corps?"

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, of course it is delightful to know that the word "marine" has some relation to the sea. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to forget it, however, because he wants to contend for the right of the President to make a pure land force of this corps.

Mr. CUMMINS. Have I suggested that?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, the Senator contended for the President's right to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Never.

Mr. TILLMAN. If he has the right, then we have no right to interfere.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am contending against this provision.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know the Senator is.

Mr. CUMMINS. The President has not made a land force of the Marine Corps by his order.

Mr. TILLMAN. What has he done?

Mr. CUMMINS. He does not change the essential character of the Marine Corps. Its work is still either at sea or upon the shore stations that have immediate connection with the navy.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the predecessors of the present Executive have considered it obligatory upon them, and it has been the practice as well as a rule of law, that a part of the Marine Corps should serve on shipboard. Now, "in his discretion," as the Senator says, the President has withdrawn these men from ships and says they shall serve on the land. The Congress says, "We pay these people; we organize them; they are under our control; and we insist that 8 per cent of the crew of each war ship shall be composed of marines." The Senator says we have no right to do that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is just what I am complaining of. If you would say to the President of the United States by law that the Marine Corps shall be employed only upon the sea, then you have at least attempted fairly and openly to make a rule and a regulation for the government of the naval force. But you do not say that. You say to the President of the United States, "You may continue to command the Marine Corps in any way that your discretion may suggest, but if you command it in a particular manner, then you must command unpaid troops." That is the proposition which you have in this amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. The principle here was fought out in England two hundred years ago, and Charles I lost his head contending for just what the Senator contends. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in view of the rapidly advancing years of the Senator from South Carolina, I am sure that the President of the United States is at least safe, and I do not have any fear of losing my head on account of the doctrines that I am now propounding. I do not see in them anything strange or anything new.

The Senator from South Carolina is the very embodiment of openness; he is the embodiment of frankness; there is no man in this Chamber who desires to drive so straight at the heart of things as the Senator from South Carolina, and yet he seems to approve this evasion of the Constitution, this indirect and indefensible way of interfering with the Army and the Navy of the United States.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator see any indirection in a plain, positive, direct proposition here that, unless you employ so many of these marines on shipboard, you shall not have any marines, for we will not pay them. Is there any indirection in that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not your purpose to destroy the Marine Corps?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; but our purpose is to compel the Executive to use the marines, or some of them, on the sea.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, again the Senator returns to the very complaint I make. If it is your purpose to direct the President of the United States to use the Marine Corps in a specified way, why do not you put that direction, that command, upon him? You might just as well change this proviso and say that "no part of this appropriation shall be used for the Marine Corps unless the President of the United States resigns his office." If you can attach a condition of that sort to the use of this money as a threat or as an inducement to the President, why do you not attach one that will be still more effectual? Why do you not say that "no part of the salary of the President of the United States shall be paid unless a per cent of the Marine Corps is employed upon the war ships of the Nation?" It is the same indirection, the same evasion, the same unwillingness to face the issue directly, to meet it as becomes a free and intelligent tribunal like this.

The point that I attempted to make yesterday was that this provision was not within the power of Congress, because it was not a rule; it was not a regulation. It was simply, as I termed it, a threat imposed upon the President in order to persuade him, or impel him, to use this force in a particular way. I hope that the Senate will not attach such a condition to the use of the money appropriated to sustain an important part of our military forces.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment I will yield the floor entirely, for I have about finished.

Mr. McLAURIN. I just want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator from Iowa is making a very interesting argument, and I frankly say that I am very much interested in the constitutional questions which he is discussing.

Congress, having power to raise and support armies, I take it that Congress has the power to judge of the necessity for an army. The Senator agrees with me on that, does he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly the Senator states a correct proposition, and I agree with him entirely.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then, suppose the Congress should consider that there was necessity for an army on the Pacific coast to prevent some threatened or suspected invasion of that section, but that there was no necessity for any army on the Atlantic coast, and suppose Congress, judging of the necessity for the raising and support of an army, should be willing to organize and support an army for the protection of any threatened or suspected danger in the Pacific, and should make an appropriation for the support of an army, and that appropriation was based on a condition that the army should be kept on the Pacific coast, would the Senator hold that that was a constitutional provision?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi states a case which, as I said a few moments ago, is very close to the border line. I am not prepared to question the right of Congress to say that the army shall be used on the Pacific coast or upon the Atlantic coast. If it can so say, then it can attach that condition to its appropriation. I am not to be understood as assenting unqualifiedly to that proposition, but it is so far removed from the provision under consideration that I do not think it is necessary to comment upon it.

I will restate my objection to this amendment. Granting the power in proper cases on the part of Congress to establish rules and regulations for the government of the military forces, as I do freely and fully, I submit that this is not a rule; it is not a regulation such as is contemplated in the Constitution. It is simply saying to the President, "Take your choice between these two things." I do not think that Congress has any right, in view of his position as Commander in Chief, to put him to the choice of commanding unpaid troops or revoking the order which he has heretofore issued. If we intend to assume the right to dispose of our forces, if we intend to insist that we shall say that Colonel Jones shall go there; that Colonel Smith shall come here; that a cavalry regiment shall be stationed at one point and an infantry regiment at another, let us have the manliness to do it directly and not indirectly.

Mr. BORAH. I observe that the chairman of the committee is absent. I merely wish to say that it is not my purpose, Mr. President, to delay the progress of this bill at all, and I would not consume a moment's time of the Senate were it not for the fact that one feature of the discussion which arose yesterday——

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to say, in view of the fact that we are meeting, after a night session, at an hour earlier to-day to discuss this matter, which is of great importance, that at least a quorum of the Senate ought to be here to listen to it; and I suggest the absence of a quorum at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich	Curtis	Hale	Page
Ankeny	Depew	Hemenway	Paynter
Bacon	Dick	Heyburn	Penrose
Bailey	Dillingham	Kean	Perkins
Bankhead	Dixon	Kittredge	Piles
Borah	Dolliver	La Follette	Platt
Bourne	du Pont	Lodge	Rayner
Brandegee	Elkins	McCumber	Richardson
Briggs	Flint	McEnery	Smith, Mich.
Bulkeley	Foraker	McLaurin	Smoot
Burkett	Foster	Martin	Stone
Burnham	Frazier	Milton	Taliaferro
Burrows	Frye	Money	Tillman
Carter	Fulton	Nelson	Warner
Clapp	Gallinger	Newlands	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Gamble	Nixon
Clay	Gary	Overman
Cummins	Guggenheim	Owen

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, but in view of the work upon Senators I can not hope, of course, that they will remain here continuously to hear this discussion. I will undertake to detain the Senate not more than a few moments.

I refer to the RECORD of yesterday, and read:

Mr. BORAH. I was going to ask if the Senator from Maryland contends that the President, as the Commander in Chief, has no constitutional powers which are not subject to the control of Congress?

Mr. RAYNER. I contend that Congress has the right to make all rules and regulations for the government of the army and navy, and that the President is absolutely subject to any rules and regulations that Congress may make. I am without the authorities now, but I discussed this question once before in the Senate. I am perfectly satisfied that this is an absolutely constitutional measure, and when Congress passes a law making regulations for the government of the land and naval forces the President himself must obey those regulations, and he has no power as the constitutional commander of the army and navy paramount to the power that is resident here in Congress to regulate the land and naval forces.

Again:

Mr. BORAH. I only want to say, not for the purpose of discussing it at this time, that under the Constitution the President of the United States is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. As such Commander in Chief he has certain constitutional powers which he may exercise and which Congress can not control, and that question has been settled, in my opinion, by our Supreme Court in numerous cases.

I did not undertake yesterday to discuss the question whether this particular measure was within the power of Congress or not, neither do I care at this time to go to any considerable extent into that discussion. I only want to submit a few suggestions with reference to the proposition which I stated, and that is that as Commander in Chief the President has certain constitutional powers which it is not within the power of Congress to modify, abolish, take away, or control; that those are such powers as inhere in the right to command. Congress may provide for the army, make rules and regulations for the government thereof, in so far as those measures appertain to that subject, but in so far as they trench upon the power of the President to command they would be inhibited by the other provision of the Constitution.

The constitutional provision, Article II, section 2, reads, so far as this discussion makes it pertinent, as follows:

The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, etc.

That is not a nominal power or a titular dignity. It is a power which draws to it the right to command, and whatever appertains to that belongs to the President and can not be trenched upon by any act of Congress. Congress may provide for the army, but it can not command it. Neither can it interfere with or embarrass the President in his command of it.

Without defining at this time what constitutes command or government, I wish to call attention to a few authorities which I had in mind yesterday when I made the statement. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work upon the Constitution, says:

Congress raises and supplies armies and navies and makes rules for their government, and there its power and duty end; the additional power of the President as supreme commander is independent and absolute. (Pomeroy, p. 558.)

The language of the author is clear and direct, and conveys at once the idea that there is belonging to the Commander in Chief a separate and independent and absolute power which is his; and as I said a moment ago, that is such power as appertains to his right to control and direct and command the army.

Again, the same author in another portion of his work, says:

The legislative powers which relate to the raising, equipping, supplying, and governing the land and naval forces have nothing in common with the separate and distinct function of commanding those forces; no particular statutes passed under the former class of attributes can interfere with the President in his exercise of the latter. Even the general clause of Article I, section 8 (par. 18), which authorizes Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers conferred upon any department of the Government, can not permit the Congress to assume the capacities and duties of Commander in Chief. * * * He commands the army and navy. Congress does not. He may make all disposition of troops and officers, stationing them now at this post, now at that; he may send out naval vessels to such parts of the world as he pleases; he may distribute the arms, ammunition, and supplies in such quantities and at such arsenals and depositories as he deems best. (Pomeroy, p. 589.)

Mr. BACON. I should like to inquire whether or not the author from whom the Senator reads cites any authority, or is that simply the expression of his private opinion?

Mr. BORAH. I will say in answer that he cites some authorities, but even if he did not, I think the opinion of Mr. Pomeroy would be worth while.

Mr. BACON. I will say that I have not interrupted the Senator in an idle way. The Senator as a lawyer very well knows the fact that in the construction of any dictum by an author, in order to get at what he really means, you have to refer to the decisions upon which he bases it. The Senator well knows that as a lawyer; and that you can take almost any author and, by taking detached sentences, prove almost any proposition, and at last the test is to go to the authorities which the author cites as the basis for his proposition in order to correctly understand what he really means.

Mr. BORAH. I have gone to the authorities which he cites.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will give us the authorities.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator allow me to say one word before we get to the authorities?

Mr. BORAH. With pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator, I know unintentionally, has omitted the passage of Pomeroy which applies to this particular case.

Mr. BORAH. If so, I will be glad to have the Senator supply it.

Mr. RAYNER. I know the Senator does not intend to omit that passage, which covers this case; and if he will allow me to give a few lines of Pomeroy in connection with the quotation he has made, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be glad to have the Senator read the quotation.

Mr. RAYNER. The quotation is right above the quotation which the Senator gave. Speaking of the power of Congress, on the same page, right above the quotation to which the Senator refers, Pomeroy says:

> Under its authority to raise armies, maintain navies, furnish supplies, and the like, Congress may direct the manner in which the President's power shall be exercised——

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. RAYNER (reading)— > for he will be, in fact, but executing its commands. Thus it may determine how many men shall be enlisted in each branch of the service, or what and how many armed vessels shall be constructed. As Congress is to make all appropriations, it may declare the specific purpose for which money is to be used; what forts shall be erected and their cost; what ships built, their character and cost; what kind of arms purchased or manufactured and the cost. Instances of this sort might be multiplied. In all these cases great or little discretion may be left to the Executive and his subordinates,, as the Legislature deems best.

> Congress is authorized to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces; it may therefore arrange and classify these forces; fix upon the plan of organization; determine upon the number, duties, and pay of officers; define military offenses and allot punishment; provide for the creation, jurisdiction, and procedure of courts-martial, and for carrying out their sentences. The President's duties in respect to these various subjects may thus be clearly defined and controlled by the Legislature.

I think if the Senator had read that, it would have taken away a little of the effect of the citation which he did read.

Mr. BORAH. The difficulty with the Senator from Maryland, if I may say so, is that he wholly fails to distinguish between the power to regulate and govern the army and the power to command it. I have not stated at any time in this discussion—and unless I become excited by reason of the attitude of the Senator from Maryland I will not state it—that the Congress has not full and complete power to raise, regulate, and make rules and prescribe regulations for the government of the army. That is what the author is speaking of. That is what he says. The instances which he gives are instances which are covered by that subject-matter.

But the author proceeds to say that notwithstanding this section Congress can not under that power trench upon the power of the President to command. I ask the Senator from Maryland to point to a single provision in Mr. Pomeroy or Mr. Story or Mr. Tucker or any other writer upon the Constitution which contradicts that proposition.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Maryland said yesterday——

Mr. RAYNER. The Senator has asked me a question. The reason I read that passage from Pomeroy was because it distinctively covers this particular case. This is a regulation that Congress is making. Otherwise I would not have interrupted the Senator. We are not arguing an abstract question here. The President, without any excitement at all——

Mr. BORAH. I am not objecting at all to the Senator's interruption. I do not want him to understand that. It is not an interference. It is a pleasure to have his suggestions upon these questions. As I said, the matter of which he is reading is the matter of regulation and of government, and not of command. I am not going to undertake at this time to define the instances, particular instances, which would constitute command and those which would constitute government, but when the twilight zone is discovered and its demarcation is outlined, then upon one side stands the President, with his absolute and independent power to command, and upon the other is Congress, with its power to provide for the government of the army.

Mr. RAYNER. This, if the Senator will allow me, is not a question of command. It comes under the proposition that Pomeroy states—

> Congress is authorized to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces; it may therefore arrange and classify these forces; fix upon the plan of organization; determine upon the number, duties, and pay of officers.

That is the only reason why I read it.

Mr. BORAH. After the army is raised and classified, then the commandership commences. Now, where the Senator quits is where I begin.

Further quoting from the same author, as the quotation has been somewhat questioned, Mr. Pomeroy, having quoted the provisions of the Constitution relative to the power of Congress to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces, says:

> The language of this clause should be carefully observed. Congress may make rules, the object of which shall be regulation and government. It can not utter exceptional or transitory mandates which affect the management and disposition of the army or navy. This particular grant of power confers no authority upon the Legislature to usurp the functions of the Commander in Chief.

Again, the same authority, speaking particularly of an act of Congress which required that the general should have his permanent headquarters at Washington, said:

> It seems to restrict the President in the exercise of his function as Commander in Chief; it prevents him from assigning the general to such place and position as he deems expedient; and so far it interferes with his power to dispose of those forces. If Congress may do it in respect to one officer high in rank, it may do this to all officers and private soldiers and may thus assume to itself the entire attributes of Commander in Chief.

This was speaking particularly of an act which provided that the general should have his headquarters at Washington, and makes the distinction between the power to command and control the army and the general rules and regulations with reference to sustaining it and governing it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understand the fundamental proposition of the Senator to be that Congress can not make any requirement as to the disposition of any part of the army.

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not want to be quoted to that extent. I will state my position, so the Senator can understand.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. I simply say that as Commander in Chief of the Army he has certain constitutional powers upon which Congress can not by legislation trench. I do not say and have not said that this particular provision comes within that, or that any particular provision so far suggested does.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I will not——

Mr. BORAH. But when we get within the power which essentially is the power to command, then it belongs to the President, and Congress can not control it.

Mr. BACON. I understand, though, that the Senator contends—and, I judge, from the reading of the authorities he has just quoted—that it is beyond the power of Congress to direct the disposition of any part of the army; to say that it shall be here or that it shall not be there.

Mr. BORAH. I would not say that except on this condition: If the President, in the discharge of his duty, should order a particular part of the army to a particular place, it would not be within the power of Congress to cancel that order.

Mr. BACON. Very well. That is exactly the point I want the Senator to come to.

I wish to ask the Senator to answer the question now I propounded to him yesterday, that he did not answer, upon the hypothetical case. That case is this: Suppose there were a closely, hotly contested presidential election, in which the issue was in doubt, depending upon the casting of the electoral votes, and the incumbent was one of the candidates, and in a time of such excitement the President should order 50,000 troops to the capital. Does the Senator contend that under those circumstances it would be beyond the power of Congress to pass a law that there should be no troops within the District of Columbia at that time?

Mr. BORAH. I will say yes.

Mr. BACON. It would be beyond the power of Congress?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; if that act was passed for the purpose of canceling the order of the President. I would not say that it would not be within the power of Congress to provide generally for the distribution of the troops, but if the President had made an order sending the army to a particular place, the order could not be canceled by an act of Congress.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly the case which I supposed—that the President had ordered 50,000 troops to the capital to be here on the 4th day of March.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. BACON. And the Senator's proposition is that our system of government is such that under such conditions the law-making power of the land could not interpose and say that upon that solemn occasion, when that high function was to be performed, those who were charged with its discharge should not be overawed by the presence of troops, and that Congress would not have the power by law to say that on that day there should not be any troops in the District of Columbia. That is the Senator's proposition.

Mr. RAYNER. In other words, we are under a military dictatorship.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say in answer to that suggestion, that certain powers have been conferred upon the President, and, as I said yesterday, if he abuses those powers there are two remedies. The President of the United States is answerable to the same tribunal precisely that you are, and he is answerable for the abuse of his power to the same tribunal that you are. He reports back every four years to the people of the United States for his power.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from Idaho yield to the senior Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely rise to suggest to my colleague, the Senator from Idaho, that the President recites in the order under consideration, in effect, that he is not acting or attempting to act by virtue of any constitutional authority, but he says specifically that he is acting by virtue of the statutory authority contained in section 1619; and it would seem to me, directing our attention to the order itself, that there is no constitutional question involved in it. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of my colleague, I stated when I arose that I did not propose to discuss this question from the standpoint of this particular order, and therefore, while I am glad to have the suggestion, it does not throw any light particularly upon my argument.

I desire to quote from the case of Ex parte Milligan, a case in which all the judges came to the same conclusion, but reached their conclusion by different courses of reasoning. I quote from the opinion of Chief Justice Chase:

> The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress, the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each include all authorities essential to its due exercise, but neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President. Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law. (Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wallace, 139.)
> Congress has the power not only to raise and support and govern armies but to declare war. It has therefore the power to provide by law for carrying on war. This power necessarily extends to all legislation essential to the prosecution of war with vigor and success, except such as interferes with the command of the forces and the conduct of campaigns. That power and duty belongs to the President as Commander in Chief. Both these powers are derived from the Constitution, but neither is defined by that instrument. Their extent must be determined by their nature and by the principles of our institutions.

It seems to me that this statement clearly sustains the position which I suggested, that when we arrive at the point of command the power belongs to the President, and Congress can not in any way infringe upon it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BORAH. With pleasure.

Mr. RAYNER. In order to get right down to the point of this discussion, because it is a practical question and not a question of abstract consideration, does the Senator believe that this provision in the bill is the exercise of a constitutional power upon our part? Does the Senator think that we have the constitutional right to put this amendment in the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. BORAH. As I stated when I rose, it is not my purpose to discuss that feature at all. I simply propose to discuss what the Senator stated yesterday he would like to have us discuss, and I was doing it largely at the Senator's request.

Mr. RAYNER. But, Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment, if you please. I say I have very grave doubts as to whether this is a constitutional power. I am not prepared, however, to say upon authority, for I have not discovered the precise question or where it has been decided. If you call for my individual opinion, I have very grave doubt, for the reason that it undertakes in an indirect way to cancel and set aside and annul an order or proceeding in disposing of these matters which the Commander in Chief saw fit to make. It is very easy to ask whether a particular instance comes within a particular power or not, but it is very difficult to say when you approach the border line. I am only attempting to show that there are powers, clearly within the power of the Commander, which we can not control, and it is for Senators to say whether this is one of them.

Mr. RAYNER. I was laboring under the impression that we were discussing this amendment, and all I intended to ask was, Is this amendment an exercise of constitutional power? No other question is involved at all. I tried to prove to the Senate, by authorities that I thought were unanswerable, that when the chairman of the Naval Committee and the committee put this amendment in the bill they were doing what the Constitution allowed them to do, and I have not heard one word which conflicts with that position.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, I am not responsible for the understanding of the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. Is not that the question we are discussing? I ask the Senator from Idaho, is not that the question before the Senate? Is it not the practical question now before the Senate? Does not the Senate want to know whether this is a constitutional amendment? Is the Senate concerned in an abstract discussion of questions that are only collateral and perhaps irrelevant? The Senate wants to be informed whether or not this amendment is constitutional, and I have not yet heard from a Senator upon the floor, either from the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Iowa, or, so far, the Senator from Idaho, one word to contradict the proposition which I think is sustained by all the text writers and all the authorities, that this particular amendment which we are discussing is an exercise of constitutional power upon the part of this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I trust if the Senator is becoming impatient——

Mr. RAYNER. Not at all. I will listen all day, if the Senator from Maine will assent to it.

Mr. BORAH. I have not heard of any impatience manifested on the part of the Senator from Maine. If the Senator from Maryland feels that he is trespassing upon the patience of the Senator from Maine, perhaps he will cut the time short by retaining his seat.

Mr. RAYNER. I will not interrupt the Senator any more.

Mr. BORAH. In the case of Fleming v. Page, in Ninth Howard, Chief Justice Taney said:

> As Commander in Chief he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command and to employ them in a manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy, etc.

Of course I will not cite any particular case upon this specific provision, because I apprehend that you would search in vain for a case which has the peculiar traits of this provision. I think of none within my limited experience, nor have I been able to find any as a precedent. But the opinion of Chief Justice Chase and the opinion of Mr. Pomeroy lay down this proposition, that it belongs to the President, as Commander in Chief, to dispose these forces, to control them, and to command them; to place them here and there as he deems best, and if this order be such as to trench upon a right it is clearly not within our power to reverse it. And I say to the Senator from Maryland, my opinion is that the proposed amendment does trench upon that power.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has suggested the question of an abuse of this power, which I do not propose to discuss further than to call attention to the fact that he knows, as a constitutional lawyer, that the liability to abuse or the possibility of abuse is no argument against the existence of a power. The Chief Justice said, in a noted case:

> Questions of power do not depend upon the degree to which it may be exercised. If it may be exercised at all it may be exercised at the will of those in whose command it is placed.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me and will not place upon me the inhibition laid upon the Senator from Maryland——

Mr. BORAH. I did not intend to make any criticism of the Senator from Maryland, but I thought the Senator from Maryland was insisting that I should conduct my discussion in a particular way, and I did not deem it within the province of a Senator to suggest that in this body.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator well knows that a well-recognized rule in construction is found in the application of extreme cases, and that extreme cases prove the law. If a man has the power, the fact that he abuses it does not take away from him the power. It may devolve upon him punishment, but none the less the power remains.

So when I give an extreme illustration to test whether or not the power exists, to say that it would be an abuse of the power does not in any manner militate against the fact of its possession. Therefore I put an extreme case to the Senator, one which I do not understand him to have given an explicit answer to. The question which I put was for the purpose of demonstrating the unreasonableness of the proposition, and the statement by the Senator that there is a manner pointed out in the law by which the abuse of the power can be punished is no answer to the proposition that the situation disclosed by that extreme proposition shows the unreasonableness of the contention made by the Senator.

Mr. President, it will not do to say that such a case may not occur. That is not the answer to it. If the power exists, it is one within such a supposition as that which I have made. If I understand the Senator, the order of the President can not be canceled by an act of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. If the order of the President is made within the constitutional power of the President.

Mr. BACON. It assumes the whole case to say it is within his constitutional power. Leaving that part of it out, I understand the Senator to say that if the President makes an order disposing of troops, locating them, it is beyond the power of Congress to pass a law setting aside that order.

Mr. BORAH. I say so, unhesitatingly.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I want to recall the Senator's attention to one clause of the Constitution which, I think, the Senator forgets.

> This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

There ought to be added in the Constitution "and military orders issued by the President of the United States."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Constitution says that "This Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land" unquestionably; and the Constitution provides that the President shall be Commander in Chief, which leaves to him certain powers, and that is the supreme law of the land and Congress can not change it.

Mr. BACON. The Senator thinks, then, that it is simply an omission on the part of the Constitution makers in that they did not specify the military orders of the President; that they meant that the orders of the President should be the supreme law of the land above the power of Congress?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the President has power to pardon. Can we control it? If he issues an order dismissing a man from prison, can we pass an act of Congress returning the man to prison?

Mr. BACON. That is a power specifically given.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is implying a power and saying that it shall be superior to the power of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I am not implying a power. The Constitution says the President shall be Commander in Chief, and that implies certain powers.

Mr. BACON. That only means that nobody can be put over him as commander of the army; that is all.

Mr. BORAH. And it implies, furthermore, that he may command.

Mr. BACON. That he may command subject to law. No man in this Nation, be he President or be he peasant, is above the law. The law is supreme; and when the law clothes the President of the United States with the power to command it does not emancipate him from liability to the command of the law. The lawmaking power of the land vested in Congress is the supreme power. A majority of the Congress with the approval of the President, or two-thirds of each House without his approval, is the supreme power of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this is only the lawmaking body within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. I think that is a plain proposition.

Mr. BORAH. And when you undertake to pass a law which is in contravention of a provision of the Constitution you can not do it. The President has full pardoning power. He makes an order discharging a prisoner. Suppose he makes an order discharging every prisoner in the United States, what are you going to do about it? There is an extreme case. There is an absolute abuse of power.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator from Idaho contend that Congress has not jurisdiction in a matter of that sort? There is a conflict of authority so far as the States are concerned because in several instances they have tried to exercise it. Has it ever been held that Congress can not regulate the pardoning power of the President?

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from Maryland, Does he think Congress has any power to regulate it?

Mr. RAYNER. No; but the Senator from Idaho treats it as a question which seems to have been determined, as a sort of axiomatic constitutional truth. I know there is a good deal of conflict of authority, and I am only asking for information because I think it is a very interesting question.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator again as a constitutional lawyer, aside from any decision of the court, does he think that the President can be controlled in the pardoning power by an act of Congress?

Mr. RAYNER. I have no definite opinion; but the Senator spoke with such absolute certainty I thought perhaps he had some authority upon the subject. If the Senate should pass an act to-day and send it to the House of Representatives and it was passed there, and the President approved it, in reference to pardon cases, would that be a constitutional exercise of power? I am not trying to pass upon it.

Mr. BORAH. I can not recall the exact language of the case of ex parte Garland, but my opinion is that you will find in that case an exact statement of the law which I have given. But I have not any doubt in my own mind as to what it is. The pardoning power belongs to the President and we can not take it away from him. He may abuse it, and there is no remedy for that abuse except in carrying the power back to the people or by impeachment. That is my opinion.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is correct in that view. There is a specific grant of power. It is not a power deduced from language of a general character. It is not one claimed as an implied power. But the contention of the Senator is that under the simple language that the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army, he is emancipated from the control of the lawmaking power of the land.

I am not going to trespass upon the time of the Senator, but I want to make one statement. The Constitution was made by those who had just gone through a revolution for the purpose of emancipating themselves from kingly rule. There never was a document drawn in which there was so carefully guarded the exclusion of all arbitrary power from any officer as is found in the Constitution in enumerating the powers of government—devolving them upon the lawmaking power and taking them away from the Executive. They stood one hundred years nearer to the days of arbitrary power and of military rule than we do; they knew the evil, and they carefully guarded it, so that the President of the United States was deprived in the exercise of power by himself of all the powers except the one that the Senator has mentioned—the pardoning power. It is the only great governmental or royal power which he can exercise, except in connection either with Congress or with the Senate.

To say that at the time immediately after our Revolutionary struggle it was intended to put within the unrestrained power of the Executive that of controlling the army, to do with it as he pleased, to order it hither and there, with none to say him nay, and to be absolutely free from the lawmaking power, is as monstrous a proposition, to my mind, as is possible, and I confess that I never expected to hear that contention made upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Georgia has never heard that from me. I do not contend for a moment that the President is not subject to the lawmaking power of this Government. Neither do I contend for a moment that it is not within the power of Congress to raise and support or to take away the army. It may take away the army from the President entirely. It may refuse to appropriate for it. It may make rules and regulations such as to make it wholly inefficient for any purpose or it may fail to raise an army at all. But when the army is once raised and provided for, then when the President comes into command, a particular order which he makes in commanding that army is wholly within the discretion of the Commander in Chief and not subject to the control of Congress. That far I go, and I go no further.

Now, I want to read from a distinguished Senator, who, I know, will command more respect in this body than my opinion will. During the discussion of the Brownsville matter, which involved an extraordinary order upon the part of the President disbanding a part of the troops, this precise question arose. Into that discussion entered the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the then Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Spooner, and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and a number of other leading lawyers of the Senate. I quote from Senator Spooner's speech. He said:

Aside from the general principle, which is sufficient, I deny that under the Constitution Congress has any such relation to the army as permits it to set aside an order lawfully made by the President as Commander in Chief. I can not agree that the sole constitutional power of the President is to command the army in the time of war and conduct campaigns; that his power is vastly greater in time of war than in time of peace has been decided and is not open to dispute. It is largely to be seen in the law of nations and in the rules of civilized warfare. But an army and a navy must be commanded in time of peace, as well as in time of war, else neither would be ready for war.

Mr. PATTERSON. I had about concluded that Congress could not legislate so as to restore these men to the army.

Now, here was an order of the President, made solely as Commander in Chief, disbanding a part of the army. Certainly an order sending it to a particular part of the United States would have been no greater exercise of his power. He was disbanding a part of an organization which had been created by the power of Congress, and that specific order was in question. The question was whether Congress could cancel that order and restore the integrity of the army which it had created. It was certainly an exercise of power of the Commander in Chief, which, if exercised to its fullest extent, would be a test of the abuse of power with reference to the commander.

Mr. Spooner said, in answer to that question:

I reached that conclusion myself.

Now, the Senator from Georgia says he never expected to hear so astounding a proposition upon the floor of the Senate. He engaged in that discussion, which was made by the distinguished Senator, and I think he sustained himself very well by authorities at that time. Senator Spooner said:

I reached that conclusion myself. The President, commanding the army in accordance with the rules made by Congress for its government and regulation, may make orders, general and special. Such orders certainly can not be countermanded by Congress.

Now, I say with reference to the rules and regulations, undoubtedly full power is in Congress, but when the President disbanded a part of the army, the sole question raised was whether or not by act of Congress it could be set aside. Could it be set aside? Was it within the power of Congress to cancel that order? Is it in the power of Congress to cancel it?

Mr. BACON. I think so, undoubtedly; and unless I very much forget what passed, or recall it very incorrectly, the Senator will look in vain, I think, for any expression of any such proposition on my part in that debate. On the contrary, I think I took exactly the opposite position. I want to say to the Senator that the question there involved was a very different one from the question which I understand to be argued by the Senator. It is true that it was related to it.

Another thing ought not to be forgotten, and that is that in every discussion the attention of parties is directed to the particular issue. Very frequently words are used which can only be explained by reference to the particular issue then involved. This was a very different question from the broad question which the Senator is now arguing as to the disposition of troops—as to what shall be done with the army.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; the Senator enlarges upon my position. I perhaps can not make myself plain.

Mr. BACON. I say——

Mr. BORAH. When you say the disposition of the army, Mr. President, you cover a vast amount of things which Congress can control, because the disposition of the army may include many things that are not covered by the power of command.

Mr. BACON. Then I understand the Senator to say that as to the disposition of a regiment or a division Congress is impotent, but that when it comes to the disposition of the army as a whole it may exercise the power. Is that so?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not say that, either. I take the position that the President in the exercise of the power to command the army has a power which we can not trench upon.

I have not undertaken to say, Mr. President, that the specific matter which the Senator refers to is within the power to command, but I do say that the position, I want the Senator to understand, which I took yesterday, and the only one I take, is that there are powers attaching to the President as Commander in Chief which we can not control. I will not undertake to say that any particular instance which the Senator calls attention to was within that power.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to say distinctly that if the President of the United States had ordered 50,000 troops to the city of Washington upon an occasion such as I have suggested it would not be within the power of Congress——

Mr. BORAH. To cancel that particular order?

Mr. BACON. To cancel that order.

Mr. BORAH. I do say so.

Mr. BACON. That, of course, is a disposition of that part of the army. I understand the Senator now to say, however, that if I enlarge the proposition to make it include the whole army, then the President would be supreme.

Mr. BORAH. I was not speaking of the whole army, but I was speaking with reference to other affairs which might be included.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. It is immaterial——

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator will find that in the debate from which he is now quoting, while there are expressions such as those used from which he has quoted, the contention was, if I recollect correctly, that while Congress had the power to prescribe what should be done or what should not be done by the Commander in Chief of the Army, in the absence of any power, either given or denied to him, the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, had the powers which usually belong to the commander in chief of an army, and that the exercise of the power to discharge these soldiers under those circumstances was not either given or denied to the President, but that it was a power which, in the absence of any express grant or express denial, did belong under the general rules of military government to the commanding officer of the army.

Mr. BORAH. I refresh the Senator's recollection with the fact that he called attention to it in the discussion, and in the opinion of the Senator from Georgia the President had that power by virtue of the statute.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Wisconsin took the position that he had it by virtue of the Constitution. So it seems to me that that proposition was clearly defined between the two Senators at the time of that discussion. Senator Spooner certainly can not be misunderstood.

Mr. BACON. The President will still have it under the Constitution in the absence of a statute because, being by the Constitution the Commander in Chief, under the proposition which I have just stated he would have the power in the absence of any express grant, because it is a power which belongs to a commander in chief unless a superior authority has taken it away from him.

I think I have trespassed too far on the time of the Senator. The Senator is making a connected argument, and I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. BORAH. I do not find any fault with the suggestion of the Senator, and I owe an apology to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. And it is not breaking up my argument at all, because I have not any connected remarks to make. I simply wish to call attention to a few authorities upon which I base my suggestion.

Mr. BACON. I wish to state, in justice to Senator Spooner, whom I very highly esteemed, not only as a man but as a lawyer, that the only criticism I ever had to make on him was that sometimes in his zeal for a cause which he espoused he was too much of an attorney; but I esteemed him as a great constitutional lawyer. I do not believe that Senator Spooner would ever stand for the proposition for which the Senator from Idaho stands to-day.

Mr. BORAH. I doubt very much myself if Senator Spooner would stand for the proposition as it is interpreted by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I may misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but when I state the position which I have stated, it is in exact accord with the position which was stated by Senator Spooner, which was stated by Mr. Pomeroy, and stated by Mr. Chief Justice Chase in the Milligan case—that is, that without defining the particular powers, there are powers which we as a Congress can not control. I have not any doubt at all that it is not within our power to take away everything from the President, as Commander in Chief, except the mere name.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me for breaking my promise, I want to give him my idea as to why the Constitution vests in the President the office of Commander in Chief.

The President is the Executive. Upon him devolves the execution of the law and the enforcement of the law; and the enforcement of the law must necessarily be, in its last analysis, through the military arm. Of course the President can not be the supreme Executive unless he has the supreme command of that through which the execution of the law must be enforced. The Senator from Idaho shook his head—I do not know whether he had allusion to the particular thing or not—when I said that the execution of the law, in its last analysis, must be through the military arm. Do I understand the Senator to dissent from that?

Mr. BORAH. I had in mind the courts.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; the process of the courts in the last analysis can only be enforced through the military arm. That is the proposition. Of course the civil authority is supreme, and the military authority is subject to the order of the civil authority and executes its orders. That is what I mean by that—not that the military is superior to the courts in any particular. Here is an order from a court; the posse comitatus is summoned for the purpose of executing the mandate of the court. The posse comitatus is unable to do it by reason of superior force opposed to it, and finally it must appeal to the Executive to use the military arm to carry out the order of the court. That is what I mean by saying that, in the last analysis, the military arm is that by which the law is executed or must be executed.

Mr. BORAH. By that process of reasoning I presume the Senator is correct, but I think one of the most astounding propositions that I have had the misfortune to hear made upon the floor is the proposition that the Senator means that the enforcing of the laws of this country is by the military.

Mr. BACON. I never said that. I said in its last analysis. I should have said in its last resort.

Mr. BORAH. I will quote one other Senator in that discussion, my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN], in the Brownsville matter. He said:

> Ever since this discussion began I have been interested more in considering the question of the power of the President than I have in considering other questions. I was convinced early that we had absolutely no power to investigate, to criticise, or to approve or disapprove the act of the President when that act was a completed act, and my opinion on that matter has not been changed.

I might quote the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] to the same effect, who contended that the President had the power not only under the statute, but under the Constitution.

I have covered, Mr. President, more time than I had any anticipation of doing when I rose to say simply this, and nothing more, so that my position may be clearly understood: That it is my opinion that, under the authority conferred upon the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the army, he has the power to command, and whatever is involved in the power and term "to command" belongs to him, and it is not within the power of Congress to trench upon that power.

As said by Mr. Pomeroy, Congress raises the army and navy, but it does not command it; that one is an independent, separate, and absolute power from the other. To that extent I go in this discussion. Further than that it was not my purpose and it is not my purpose now to go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which was reserved for a separate vote by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I should be glad to have the precise question stated. We have had a long discussion, and the question is not understood by all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 6, after the word "dollars," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, adopted the following proviso:

> Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein made for the Marine Corps shall be expended for the purposes for which said appropriations are made unless officers and enlisted men shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships and armored cruisers, and also upon such other vessels of the navy as the President may direct, in detachments of not less than 8 per cent of the strength of the enlisted men of the navy on said vessels.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with whom I have a general pair, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STONE (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. STONE. I have a standing pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON] is detained at home on account of sickness. For the benefit of the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], who is paired with him, I will say that if my colleague were present he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. FLINT. Under the statement of the junior Senator from Texas I will allow my vote in the affirmative to stand.

Mr. GAMBLE (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire as to whether the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. GAMBLE. Then I desire to withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. MARTIN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I understand that he has not voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The senior Senator from Illinois has not voted.

Mr. MARTIN. Then I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 12, as follows:

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1008) thereon. I desire to give notice to the Senate that I shall call up the bill for consideration as soon as the naval appropriation bill has been disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 26394) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I reserved also the amendment, which was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, reducing the limit of cost of the battle ships from six million to four and a half million dollars. That very important amendment passed, apparently, without any debate. Unfortunately I was late in getting to the Senate, and I heard of it only when I arrived last evening. It seems to me that it is more important than any other amendment to this bill.

I had supposed that there would be no amendment offered to that feature of the bill. It had been reported from the committee, apparently, without any dissenting vote. It was the action of the House, adopted after long debate and every possible test, by a majority of more than two to one. I had supposed that that question was practically settled.

Last year, it will be recalled, Mr. President, we had a very earnest debate on the question of having four or two battle ships. The debate lasted many days and there was a strong minority of the Senate favoring four battle ships. At a time toward the close of that debate the late Senator from Iowa, Mr. Allison, said:

> I believed then and I believe now that we ought under our present situation and the circumstances that surround us to make provision for two battle ships each year for at least some years to come.
> When I found that the Committee on Naval Affairs had undertaken to facilitate the construction of the battle ships provided by the House by an appropriation of $7,000,000, I was content with that appropriation, as I am content now with it; and I would be willing, as I think most of the Senate would, and I think there would be no serious objection to it, to provide at the next session of Congress for two additional battle ships, and to do that year by year until our modern navy is sufficient for the needs of our country and efficient in all its provisions.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said:

> Before the Senator takes his seat, I will state that it is to me a matter of great satisfaction to hear the veteran, experienced Senator from Iowa express so clearly his view in this matter. That is my view, and I am glad to agree with him. I have stated already in the course of the debate that the committee believes this a moderate programme, and without, of course, foreseeing what may be the conditions hereafter, we will expect to carry it out to this extent in the future, and that it will give us not a moderate navy, but a very great navy, and keep us in the second place in the world.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] said:

> One other word, Mr. President. The distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison] has said that he was in favor of sustaining the American Navy. So am I. I think the character and efficiency of our navy should always be fully maintained, and I shall vote for this bill with the full knowledge that it will accomplish this purpose. I shall next year vote for two battle ships, or more than two, if they are necessary to maintain the efficiency of the American Navy. I may then vote for a different type from that being authorized to-day. As I said on Friday, this matter of building navies is a matter of evolution. There may not be a Senator here who next year will be in favor of voting for any battle ship of the Dreadnought type.
> But whatever may be the requirements for the navy, either for its maintenance or for its necessary extension, I shall be found among the first to vote for whatever is required to secure for the navy the highest state of efficiency.

Those statements which I have read, made by Senators of such weight and standing as those three Senators, had a great influence upon the Senate. The proposition for four battle ships was defeated, but we provided for two, with a limit of appropriation of $6,000,000 for each ship.

Mr. President, it may be said that the number of ships is retained in this bill, but if you cut down the limit of cost you keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator has stated does cover the transaction last year. I only wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment adopted by the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, which was presented by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], provides for two ships exactly like the four which were urged by the department and the President last year. It provides for ships of the same tonnage, of the same displacement—the same ships that last year the President and the Navy Department insisted were the type that should be adopted—so that the two ships covered by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota are the two ships that the Senate last year did not put on, but which all of us promised would probably be put on this year. Nobody ever thought then of a programme for a 26,000-ton battle ship.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the promise last year was not for two ships such as were authorized then. It was for an increase of two battle ships. Naval architecture is progressive. I do not say that we need, necessarily, ships of greater expense than the ships authorized last year, but we may need ships of a higher speed—I am inclined to think we do—and speed is very expensive. It may be wise to build a somewhat larger ship. I have looked for the suggestion as to this 26,000-ton ship in all the official documents that I could lay my hands on, but I can not find where it comes from. It is not in the bill; it is not in the Secretary's report.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. MONEY. In conversation with the Senator this morning in the Committee on Foreign Relations, he stated that there was no authority to say that these battle ships were to be of 26,000 tons displacement. I admitted that such a provision was not in the bill or in the Secretary's report, but it was in many things said outside. I immediately telephoned to the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and asked him what was to be the tonnage or displacement of the two battle ships provided by this bill. His answer was 26,000 tons. I said, "Will you be kind enough to repeat that statement?" and he repeated it. Everybody knows that the ships will be 26,000 tons if money enough is given for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was saying—I was not aware of the information the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] received this morning—I was saying that authorization for a 26,000-ton ship is not in the bill, and it is not in the report of the Secretary of the Navy. If it is the intention of the Navy Department to build 26,000-ton ships, it is because they believe that is the best and most economical type of ship to build. It does not follow, because we built one type last year, that we are bound to have that type every year.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] carefully guarded against any such construction as that in what he stated in the debate last year. We limited the cost to $6,000,000 for each of those ships, and found it possible to build them for $4,500,000. Why should we change the limit of cost of last year? Are we to duplicate the two battle ships, with the same limit of cost? If we can get a better type of ship, should we not have it?

The great purpose of the American Navy and of the American policy, as I understand, is to have ships that are better in type than any other ships in the world. Our naval victories in the war of 1812 were because our frigates were a little heavier, a little larger, and carried more metal and more men than the ships of the same type in the other navies of the world.

Mr. President, I think this time is particularly ill-chosen to cut down the navy. That we are not doing anything unreasonable, see how far short we fall of what the department recommends.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator suggests that this is an inopportune time to cut down the navy.

Mr. LODGE. That is my opinion.

Mr. CLAPP. If this amendment cuts down the navy, certainly it does not carry out the purpose I had in offering it.

Mr. LODGE. In my judgment, it cuts down the building programme of the navy. The Navy Department have recommended four battle ships; we are giving them two. They recommended four scout cruisers; we are giving them none. They recommended ten destroyers; we are giving them five. They recommended four submarines; we are giving them four. They recommended three colliers; we are giving them one. They recommended one repair ship, one ammunition ship, and two minelaying ships. I do not think we are making any provision for those. We are far below the programme of the department. I will venture to say that there is not an estimate from another department that has been cut so severely as the naval estimate in respect to the building programme. I think, Mr. President, it is a great mistake to cut it any further.

I do not wish to take the time of the Senate by going into a general debate on the question of the navy; but I could not allow this amendment to go—and I confess it took me completely by surprise, for I had supposed the matter was settled and that the committee report would stand—I could not allow it to go without at least expressing my own views in regard to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to ask the Senator if the two ships which are proposed under the amendment, namely, 21,000-ton ships, are not as large as any now under construction anywhere in the world?

Mr. LODGE. I believe they are.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, if we are at the very front and abreast of any and every body in Christendom, why does the Senator want to stretch further?

Mr. LODGE. Because we want better ships and to be a little further ahead.

Mr. TILLMAN. And next year you will want 30,000-ton ships, and the year after next you will want 40,000-ton ships. Where does the maximum of efficiency come in?

Mr. LODGE. We will stop at the maximum of efficiency, but not before.

Mr. TILLMAN. I know we will stop when we get there.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I do not think, Mr. President, that we can undertake to say here what the maximum of efficiency is and that we ought to stop at a 21,000-ton ship.

I have the greatest possible respect for the naval knowledge of the Senate; but I think this is a highly technical question. If it is better to have a 26,000-ton ship, if such a ship is more economical and a better fighting machine, then we ought to have it. I do not believe that there is any purpose on the part of the department or of the officers to build ships simply for size. I think their object is to get the best and most efficient ships.

Times have changed, Mr. President, in regard to demands upon the navy. When we entered on the policy of the new navy the only need of a navy practically was on the Atlantic coast. The Pacific coast was so distant from any naval power of importance that it was not considered in making estimates for the navy. But we must have a powerful fleet on the Pacific coast. We may as well recognize it now as at any other time, and until the Panama Canal is completed, so that it will take but a comparatively short time to move the fleet from one coast to another, the protection of the Pacific coast makes it necessary to have more ships than would otherwise be required.

I am no alarmist; I have no predictions of war; I believe we are at friendship with all the nations of the earth, and I want to remain so. But I believe that the best guaranty of peace that this country has is the Navy of the United States, and that the cheapest money that we spend is money spent on that fleet. I believe Nelson was right when he said that the best negotiators in Europe were his "seventy-fours." I think the voyage of the fleet around the world has done more to promote peace than anything that has been done. I think the condition of affairs in the Pacific, our enlarged interests there, the growing interests of our coast, demand a powerful fleet. We can not afford to divide the fleet and leave it open to be beaten in detail. We must have a fleet to protect our Pacific coast as capable and more than capable of meeting with superior force any squadron that can be brought against it.

You can, no doubt, lower the number of ships on the Atlantic coast, but you can not leave it stripped and undefended. The time has gone by when the fleet can be kept on one coast of the United States, and I think the reduction of the appropriation is equivalent to a reduction of the ships. If you continue on the theory of reducing the limit of cost, you can get down to two battle ships of 5,000 tons and say you are keeping up the navy with two ships. Give to the Navy Department just what they had last year. It is not an unreasonable programme. They got the ships last year a million and a half cheaper than the limit of cost. They will try to make the best price they can. It is not an excessive amount, and I hope the Senate will allow the appropriation to stand where the House put it and where the committee, without dissent, reported it.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator point out wherein the amendment fails to allow the Navy Department to construct just as good ships as those authorized last spring?

Mr. LODGE. It leaves them to construct exactly as good ships as were authorized last spring. I assume, unless there is a rise in the price of material, as may well happen. On the face of it it allows as good ships. There are improvements constantly in ships. It may cost more to make a better ship, and if there is a better ship to be had, the Navy Department ought to have the opportunity to get it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in order that I may not appear to be inconsistent, I desire to explain my vote on this proposition.

In 1893 I had the honor to be assigned to membership on the Committee on Naval Affairs. At that time we had not a single battle ship afloat; or at least none was in commission. At that time the number of sailors in the navy allowed by law, including the act of March 3, 1893, was 9,000, while the number in service was 7,825. At that time the number of marines in the navy, allowed by law, was 2,100, and there were in service 1,896. The number of sailors in the navy now allowed by law, including the act of May 13, 1909, is 44,500; in service, 43,589. The number of marines in the navy in 1909, allowed by law, is 9,521; in service, 9,305. The appropriations for the support of the navy in 1893 amounted to $23,000,000. The bill under consideration as reported from the Senate committee carries $136,825,190.05.

Since that time we have continued at each session of Congress to make appropriations for the increase of the navy. I have had the honor to vote with the majority on every naval appropriation bill since that time until to-day. We have now in commission 25 battle ships and 6 in process of construction, making 31 battle ships of the highest type known. We provide in this bill for 2 battle ships, the cost of which is estimated at $10,500,000 each. Replying to the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. LODGE. The limit of cost stated in the bill is $6,000,000.

Mr. PERKINS. It was stated by the Secretary that with armor, completed, and ammunition on board and ready for sea, they would stand at $10,500,000 each.

Mr. HALE. The $6,000,000 is only for hull and machinery.

Mr. PERKINS. For the hull and machinery.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I meant.

Mr. BURROWS. For each ship.

Mr. HALE. For each.

Mr. PERKINS. I voted last year in favor of two battle ships, which were more than the President in his message recommended three years ago. In 1905 he said:

> Probably the result would be attained by adding a single battle ship to our navy each year, the superseded or outworn vessels being laid up or broken up as they are thus replaced.
> During the present Congress there need be no additions to the aggregate number of units of the navy. Our navy, though very small relatively to the navies of other nations, is for the present sufficient in point of numbers for our needs, and while we must constantly strive to make its efficiency higher, there need be no additions to the total number of ships now built and building, save in the way of substitution as above outlined.

Again, in his message to Congress in 1906, he said:

> I do not ask that we continue to increase our navy. I ask merely that it be maintained at its present strength; and this can be done only if we replace the obsolete and outworn ships by new and good ones, the equals of any afloat in any navy. To stop building ships for one year means that for that year the navy goes back instead of forward. The old battle ship Texas, for instance, would now be of little service in a stand-up fight with a powerful adversary. The old double-turret monitors have outworn their usefulness, while it was a waste of money to build the modern single-turret monitors. All these ships should be replaced by others; and this can be done by a well-settled programme of providing for the building each year of at least one first-class battle ship.

I wish to say, in passing, that the navy is one branch of the public service which is popular with the people. It has their confidence. It has their respect. They feel a just and proper pride in it, for the officers of the navy are selected by the Members of Congress. Each Representative and each Member of the Senate has two midshipmen in the Naval Academy, while the President himself has the appointment at large of 20 midshipmen, who are usually the sons of naval officers. It is therefore the most popular branch, as it should be, of the Government, and the people have never found fault, so far as I have been able to learn, with the appropriations made by Congress for the support of the navy.

Mr. President, we have to-day, as I stated, 25 battle ships in commission and 6 in process of construction, about 50 per cent completed, and 2 more are provided for in the pending bill. We have 12 armored cruisers of the very highest type and 22 protected cruisers, making in all one hundred and five or ten ships of war, and, including torpedo boats and others, over 200 vessels of war. I have voted, as I say, for every one of these propositions. I refer to it especially because the Commander in Chief saw proper to go out of his way and criticise my acts in having hampered the appropriations for the navy. He evidently was not well informed, for I am sure he would not willfully violate the ninth commandment of the decalogue, which says "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." I am sure he would not do so intentionally, for he has the confidence and respect of the people of this nation. They admire him for his patriotism; they admire him for his great ability; they admire him for his public spirit and integrity; and we all have the same object in view—to do that which is for the best interest of our country and build up, among other things, a splendid, strong navy. I believe it is the best bond for peace that we can give to the world, and therefore I have always voted for these appropriations.

I wish to give a résumé of what we have been doing during the last seven years.

[a] Armored cruisers.

Cost uncompleted vessels	$56,659,800
Total construction for 7 years	129,464,023
Total for entire navy	344,904,298

The amount spent in new construction and authorized in the past seven years is 37½ per cent of the cost of the entire navy as it stands to-day.

The tonnage of battle ships and armored cruisers constructed and authorized in the past seven years is 43 per cent of the total tonnage of all the battle ships and armored cruisers built or authorized.

The tonnage of all classes of construction completed or authorized in the past seven years is 46 per cent of the tonnage of all war ships built or authorized above 1,000 tons and all torpedo craft of 50 tons and over.

Of the appropriations for the naval establishment since 1883, amounting to $1,374,624,001, there has been authorized during the past seven years $722,283,699, or over 56 per cent.

Total battle ships, 31; built or authorized in past seven years, 14.

Total armored cruisers, 12; built or authorized in past seven years, 4.

Mr. President, I believe that one of the chief causes of the popularity of the present administration during the past seven years has been because the President has urged with all his force and power the building up of a great navy. I regret that when the battle ships were on the Pacific coast he did not see his way clear as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to permit some of the ships to remain there; for we in California and Oregon have built the Nebraska, the Ohio, the Oregon, and the Wisconsin. Of the armored cruisers, we built the California and South Dakota. To-day in the Pacific coast fleet I think there is not a single battle ship. There are armored cruisers, but in certain contingencies they can not take the place of battle ships. Of the 16 ships now on the way to Hampton Roads——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. The Senator realizes, does he not, that upon this bill has been put a provision that in the discretion of the President one-half of the navy may be sent to the Pacific coast? I think that is right. Does not the Senator realize that under that provision, of the 31 battle ships built and building, there can be sent to the Pacific coast a better and larger fleet to remain there than the entire fleet which has just completed the circuit of the globe? So his coast, I think the Senator will agree with me, is in no way to be discarded or neglected.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the Senator from Maine on behalf of the people of the Pacific coast for having consented yesterday to a declaration in the pending bill that it should be the policy of our Government to keep a part of our ships on the Pacific coast. I refer to it now because 16 battle ships are en route to Hampton Roads. They have passed through the Isthmus of Suez, for which we paid $133,000 in tolls. That money was not kept at home with our own people. One reason why I am in favor of building battle ships and ships of war at home is that the money is kept here among our own people. It is distributed to the miner who mines the iron ore, to the machine shops, to the foundries, to the skilled workmen who manufacture our engines and boilers. Ninety per cent of a battle ship is labor. Therefore I say it is wise policy from that standpoint to build them.

As I said before, I believe it is not only wise policy from an economic standpoint, but that it is the best bond we can give to the world for the peace of our country. A number of these battle ships should remain on the Pacific coast. It is a wide and vast country from San Diego to Point Barrow, Alaska. Following the indentations and sinuosities of the coast the distance is equal to the circumference of the world—25,000 miles.

Then, again, we have the islands of the Pacific, the Hawaiian Islands. I believe they should be made a strong naval base for the Government of the United States. They should be of great value to us as a naval base. So, acting on this line, I voted for the larger battle ships, as recommended by the President, recommended by the Navy Department, and by your committee as they reported the bill to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator from California takes his seat, I wish to ask him whether or not he shares with the President in his fear of consequences to the Pacific coast in the event we do not keep ourselves on a par with Japan in that ocean?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not think there is the slightest danger of war with Japan or any other country. In the first place, the United States wants to deal fairly and justly with all foreign countries, and if they are not willing to reciprocate in kind, we have the power, we have the great reserve, to compel them to do so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Further, I wish to call the attention of the Senator to a remarkable statement which the President made either last year or the year before—I do not remember which, but year before last, I think it was—in which he took the position, or something like it, that the Japanese were just as good people as ours, and that we ought to welcome them and even give them citizenship. Does the Senator share that view?

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly do not. I simply want to live up to the spirit of the treaty we have with Japan, which is the supreme law of the Nation, it having been ratified and confirmed by two-thirds of the Senate of the United States. I believe under that treaty we have reserved to the respective States the power to make police regulations, to regulate the schools and the public health.

I have on my desk before me the message of the President of the United States sent to Congress in 1906, which, perhaps, may answer the question of the Senator from South Carolina as to citizenship. The President says:

> I recommend to the Congress that an act be passed specifically providing for the naturalization of Japanese who come here intending to become American citizens. One of the great embarrassments attending the performance of our international obligations is the fact that the statutes of the United States are entirely inadequate. They fail to give to the National Government sufficiently amply power, through United States courts and by the use of the army and navy, to protect aliens in the rights secured to them under solemn treaties which are the law of the land. I therefore earnestly recommend that the criminal and civil statutes of the United States be so amended and added to as to enable the President, acting for the United States Government, which is responsible in our international relations, to enforce the rights of aliens under treaties. Even as the law now is something can be done by the Federal Government toward this end, and in the matter now before me affecting the Japanese, everything that it is in my power to do will be done, and all of the forces, military and civil, of the United States which I may lawfully employ will be so employed.

From my acquaintance with the Japanese I do not believe there is one in a thousand who comes here because he is attached to our institutions or because he believes in our form of government. I believe it is the bounden duty of the President of the United States, as it is the duty of every citizen, to maintain in spirit as well as letter the treaty we have with that great country.

Mr. TILLMAN. At the same time, if the President is such a friend of the Japanese as to want to make them citizens, why should he be so uneasy about a war with them?

Mr. PERKINS. It is barely possible that he has some information which has not been imparted to the Senate of the United States, but be that as it may, I do not believe the Japanese could stand up for one day against the forces of the United States. They have no base of operations, unless they should take the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands, and even then they would be far away from our coast. There is no need of fear of them, in my opinion. We simply want to carry out in spirit and letter the treaty with that nation which has been ratified by the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator recognize any treaty-making right in Congress or anywhere else to govern and control the schools of California?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the treaty reserves that power to the States respectively.

Mr. TILLMAN. Therefore, all this smoke and hurrah about a war with Japan over this matter appears to be on a par with the attack of the President on the Senator from California, that he has been an obstructionist in building up the navy.

Mr. PERKINS. He was simply mistaken in my case, and he may be in other cases.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator is very kind in his estimation of the President's action, more so than I could be.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. PERKINS,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. In the absence of the Senator from Montana, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PERKINS resumed and concluded his speech.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, this matter generally relates to a subject to which I have not given any very close or extensive attention, but it seems to me the aspect in which it presents itself here to-day is one that an ordinary mind can comprehend, and will readily reach the conclusion that it is improperly here. The American people have determined to have a navy which, both in its extent and the character of the ships that constitute it, shall comport with the dignity and power of this Government. I think that is accepted as settled policy and meets with universal approval, and it can only be antagonized by indirect methods.

At the last session of Congress we had under discussion the question how many ships were required to bring the navy up to the standard of efficiency, and it was solemnly ascertained that two first-class battle ships each year until the policy was otherwise announced would meet the requirements.

At that time ships of 21,000 tons capacity were regarded as the maximum, or at least, according to the technical developments up to that time, were regarded as what could safely be undertaken in the form of actual construction. Six million dollars was provided for each one of the two, with the definite understanding as nearly as those things can bind Senators in their future official conduct, that a similar number of ships should be provided each year, with a similar amount of money behind them.

It was not provided in that bill, nor is it provided in this one, that the particular character of ships should be in detail specified. That is left to the technical corps and faculty of the Navy Department. It is a matter that may change overnight; and simply because the ships constructed under the former authorization were limited to 21,000 tons, not by the act of Congress but by the action of those charged with the administration of the act, is not sufficient reason to say that there never should be ships of greater magnitude constructed. It is an admission, taken under the circumstances, that so far as we are concerned we propose to occupy a subordinate position in the matter of providing ships; that we must wait until England or some other country, Chile or Brazil, shall have made the experiment and demonstrated the fact that the maximum of efficiency has not been attained. I do not believe that in the matter of shipbuilding or anything else we need take notice of what other countries do, except for the purpose of utilizing, with our broader and more liberal methods, the better things which are contained in their matters of execution.

The matter of $6,000,000 each for two ships was passed on by the House of Representatives; it was passed upon by the committee here; and now for some reason—without reason—upon the mere naming of the proposition the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee accepts it. I say it is a retrograde step. It is something that ought to call for definite explanation. It is a change of policy not justified, in my judgment, by anything that has been brought out in this discussion.

The mere bagatelle of saving $3,000,000 in a bill carrying $140,000,000 will not explain it. The mere saving of $3,000,000 in a budget of appropriations covering a billion will not explain it. We have a right to experiment in the construction of ships, not because we expect to fight with them, but because we expect to gain the security which comes from the fact that if a fight shall unfortunately come to us as a part of our history, we will be prepared for it as well as others and not be taken by surprise, either in inadequacy of numbers or inefficiency in size.

I see no reason—and I have listened with some attention to the debate—why the appropriation should be reduced from $6,000,000 each to $4,500,000 each, unless it is for the purpose of fixing what has already been done as the limit of possible execution on the part of the greatest Government the sun ever shone on. I think the demand is a very modest one when we want two ships of such size as $6,000,000 for each will construct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURKETT. What is the question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made in the Committee of the Whole, the second one reserved by the Senator from Massachusetts, relating to the battle ships.

Mr. BURKETT. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota reducing the amount?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. The amendment reduces the amount appropriated for these ships.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CLAPP. It reduces the amount proposed to be appropriated. The Senator kept insisting that it was a reduction——

Mr. SCOTT. Before the commencement of the roll call, I wish to make an inquiry. We want to understand it. We vote to reduce it, if we vote "yea;" we vote to keep it as it now is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLINT (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLINT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FULTON. I announce my general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT] and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 45, as follows:

So the amendment was nonconcurred in.

Mr. HALE. There are certain amendments that are carried with the vote just taken which I wish to have made. I wish to have the Senate disagree to the amendment on page 68, lines 17 and 18, reducing the amount and leaving it as passed by the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Was not that a part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota? If so, the text of the bill as it came from the House will be restored by the nonconcurrence in the amendment made.

Mr. HALE. That may be the parliamentary condition. On page 71 there are two amendments that should be made. In line 9, "seven" was stricken out and "two" inserted. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 15 "twelve" was stricken out and "eleven" inserted; and in line 16 "four" was stricken out and "nine" was inserted. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to perfect the amendment which I offered last evening shortly before adjournment, by striking out a portion which was inadvertently copied by my clerk and added to the amendment as offered, so that the amendment as pending shall be in the terms of the proposition which I have just sent to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin modifies his proposed amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment, line 20, after the word "commission," strike out the remainder of the amendment, in the following words:

And hereafter no part of the public moneys, or of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made by Congress, shall be used for the payment of compensation or expenses of any commission, or any members thereof, unless the creation of such commission shall have been authorized by Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as now perfected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission to be called the commission on naval bases, to be composed of officers of the Engineer Corps of the Army and officers of the Navy. It shall be the duty of this commission to inquire into and report to Congress during its next regular session the number, location, and capacity for rapid repairs of the naval bases which are required by strategic considerations for the successful conduct of the fleet in time of war and for maintaining the fleet continuously in a state of readiness for war in time of peace, the report to include recommendations as to what existing navy-yards and naval stations can be expanded to the capacity required for an efficient military base for a large fleet, and the location and capacity of such new bases as should be constructed, and a further recommendation as to what existing navy-yards and naval stations should be wholly or partially abandoned. For these purposes the commission is authorized to sit during the session or recess of Congress, at such times at is may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summons and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical experts, stenographers, and messengers necessary, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission is created. The commission may, through subcommittees or otherwise, conduct their work or any part of it. A sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this section and to pay the necessary expenses of the commission and its members is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said appropriation shall be immediately available and shall be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman of said commission by any clerk appointed for that purpose by the commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time to prolong unduly the debate upon the pending bill. I have taken but little of the time which has been given to the discussion since the bill came before the Senate for debate and amendment.

My first word, Mr. President, when this bill came up last Thursday was one of protest against its being disposed of within the two hours remaining of that day's session. It has now been under consideration nearly three legislative days, and I venture to say that the debate has been profitable and has been informing both to the Senate and to the country. I have observed that the press, a portion of it, has disapproved of this discussion and has pronounced it a "filibuster." The same attitude of mind prevails in a measure, I think, among members of this body.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HALE. I should like here to say, just at the point where the Senator has referred to the charge of filibustering, I have had considerable experience in the management and passage of appropriation bills, but I have not during the continuance of this discussion seen anything that indicated to me a purpose of filibustering, as the term should be known and recognized, on the part of Senators opposing amendments. There has been persistency. The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] was persistent, but that he had a right to be; and when he and those acting with him saw what the feeling was in the Senate, and the desire for a vote, we proceeded as rapidly as I supposed we would with the consideration of the bill.

I, Mr. President, appreciated the fact that last night at the evening session, the first evening session that the Senate has been obliged to resort to, and which is quite frequently a failure, Senators appeared here and the process of considering the bill by clauses and by voting on amendments was not in the least obstructed either by the Senator or any Senator in sympathy with him. We proceeded, and with the exception of the reservations, perfected the bill and passed numerous important amendments, and during a good deal of that time there was no quorum present. Nobody realized that better than I in charge of the bill did, and how easy it would have been to have obstructed the entire proceedings. Neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor the Senator from Montana nor any Senator who had opposed amendments and had argued upon them raised the point of there being no quorum. So far as I am concerned, I do not want anybody to think, while I am very desirous of prosecuting the public business, that I believe there has been in this case a resort to what is known and understood as "filibustering."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the RECORD show this statement of the Senator from Maine. I hope, sir, that the proceeding upon this bill may follow on all appropriation bills of importance to the country. This is the first time in many years—I have been so informed at least—that an appropriation bill from the Naval Committee has been debated here at any length, excepting in one instance where one proposition consumed considerable time in debate.

If I may be permitted to say so, sir, this body appears to have fallen into the practice of reserving appropriation bills until near the close of the session and of then treating as obstructive any show or manifestation of a disposition to debate them. Sir, debate upon an appropriation bill or any other bill of importance should never come to be regarded as obstruction or as filibustering against legislation.

I have offered this amendment, Mr. President, because I believe that the system of determining the location of navy-yards and the placing of the large appropriations is inherently wrong.

Mr. President, in what I say here to-day I wish to be understood as arraigning a system rather than as arraigning men. Very likely if the personnel of the Naval Committee had been different but the committee had still been composed of Senators representing States with navy-yards you would have had precisely the same sort of bill presented, and precisely the same unjustifiable appropriations made. In other words, Mr. President, I mean to say that the plan of leaving such matters as come before this committee to the determination of Senators representing States where there are large appropriations to be made is wrong in principle. We are administering a trust fund, and I know of no principle which would recognize the disposal of a trust fund by those who have some interest, political or otherwise, in its disposal.

This does not imply anything more than that it is natural that Senators representing States where appropriations are to be placed will vie with each other in a struggle to secure the largest appropriations possible under all the circumstances for the States from which they come. Mr. President, this may be in a measure, and probably is in a great degree, unconscious upon their part; but, because human nature is constituted as it is, the men who represent States which are to be benefited by these tremendously large appropriations should not be the ones to so largely determine their expenditure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. I believe, Mr. President, that the position taken by the Speaker of the House of Representatives upon this question, as I understand it, is one that merits approval. I have not analyzed the composition of the Naval Committee of the other House, but I have understood that the committee as made up there is not composed of Representatives from districts in which the appropriations are expended, a plan which seems well calculated to lessen the temptation to jobbery.

Now, as to whether the bill presented here and the appropriations as made for a long series of years justify the criticism which I am making is a matter easily determined, I think. Indeed, I believe that the members of this committee will assent to the proposition that the placing of these appropriations is more or less political.

I have studied the report of the Secretary of the Navy showing the disposition of the work in the different navy-yards where the money is expended. It seems to me that the scanty appropriation made for work in the navy-yards of the South—I do not mean for work upon the development of those navy-yards, but for the work that is performed there, the repair work, the sending of ships to be repaired, and all that—manifestly shows that those States are discriminated against. It seems to me that the distribution and division of the appropriation in the work that is performed in the different navy-yards shows a line of cleavage that stamps the bill, and stamps the policy of administration, as political.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURKETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is indicting the Navy Department itself as a political machine, and in some of the things which he has just stated I am compelled to agree, because I myself have complained of the same state of things; that as to vessels which could be repaired in southern navy-yards and work that could be done there, the vessels are not sent there and the work is not done there. Why, I can not tell, unless it is that the political influences controlling the Navy Department have kept it from being so. I am very glad to find that the Senator is assenting to the proposition that I advanced yesterday, that there are influences at work, whether political or otherwise, which are inimical to southern navy-yards and to the South in general, and I hope the Senator will pursue that theme and bring out all the facts possible. It is evident, to my mind, that the South in its treatment by the Navy Department is still regarded as a conquered province and that the people there are regarded more or less as aliens.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the reference which I made to the distribution of work in the different navy-yards is simply a manifestation, and only a minor one, of the wrongfulness of this whole policy—the number and location of navy-yards and the appropriations made for them.

The fact is manifest from even a brief study of the subject that we have not as yet developed anywhere a single naval base in which we could take care of a fleet if war came upon us. Could there be stronger proof, Mr. President, of the wrongfulness of the entire policy that is pursued? I believe, furthermore, that it is susceptible of proof that the waste and extravagance in all these navy-yards is almost criminal in its character. It is an outgrowth of this same bad policy.

Much has been said in this debate concerning magazine articles and other publications which have criticised this policy. Magazine writers and the publishers of magazines and papers which have given place to these criticisms have been severely denounced, and the criticisms have been branded as false and malicious in their character and as a species of muck raking; yet, Mr. President, I notice in the course of this debate that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]—and it seemed to me that his position was somewhat inconsistent—admitted that this appropriation bill and those which have preceded it have been a series of gross extravagances; that they have been unduly large; that they are growing more and more unjustifiable all the time, and yet this strange attitude of the Senator from Maine with respect to expenditures, reducing them on the side of giving us a strong fleet, and increasing them on the side of providing for these widely distributed and not very useful navy-yards, not very useful at least in a time when war should come upon us, is but another admission, confession, or proof of this bad policy.

It is very difficult, Mr. President, for one who has not been trained upon the committee—one who has not had extended opportunity for the study of this subject—to get hold in a brief time of the salient and important phases of this question. It almost seems as though the bills were so constructed as to baffle investigation. I do not mean by that to imply intention; but it seems to me that the whole plan of the construction of this bill, for instance, is one to confuse any investigator seeking to ascertain what expenditures go to certain items of the bill. Take, for instance, the appropriation carried for navy-yards. When the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] was pressing the excess of those appropriations home upon the attention of the Senate, the Senator from Maine replied in part as follows:

> The entire appropriations for navy-yards for a series of years are small, very small, compared with the entire appropriations, and smaller than in rival countries.

A little later he said:

> The figures for navy-yards, for everything spent upon them, compared with the aggregate of big bills that frighten Senators, as they ought to, are small indeed; and if the Senator will look at the figures and compare them with other things, he will find that all these charges fall to the ground.
> The whole appropriation this year, as I have shown, including the increase, is only $4,800,000 for all the yards.

Mr. President, it is true that in one place in the bill you will find a summing up of appropriations for navy-yards in this language:

> Total public works, navy-yards and stations, $4,202,000.

I do not know just what impression the answer of the Senator from Maine made upon the mind of the Senator from Montana. But to my mind, as I sat listening to the debate, it seemed a comprehensive statement that only $4,800,000 was spent in these navy-yards, all told.

The language seems so broad as to make it cover everything—

> The figures for navy-yards, for everything spent upon them, compared with the aggregate of big bills, etc.—

And then concluding with the statement that "$4,800,000 covered it."

Mr. President, outside of appropriation for public works under the Bureau of Yards and Docks, summed up on page 32 of the bills which I have just read, I find appropriations for the improvement and maintenance of navy-yards and stations on many other pages of the bill not embraced in that summary. On page 18 there is an appropriation of $255,690 that goes, by the terms of the bill, directly to the navy-yards; on page 20, $100,000; on page 21, $31,000; on page 24, $450,000; on page 25, $1,500,000; on page 25, $30,000; on page 36, another item of $11,500; on page 37, another item of $39,500; on page 48, another item of $144,000; and on page 50, another item of $165,000, or a total of several different appropriations for navy-yards amounting to $2,729,940 in addition to the sum of $4,800,000 given by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as the total appropriation for navy-yards. Besides that there are 51 other items of appropriation not separable, which go, by the terms of the appropriation, partly into the navy-yards and partly elsewhere, so that you can not divide them and ascertain just how much goes to navy-yards—51 other items, I say, scattered through this bill, the aggregate of which amounts to a very large sum.

Every time, Mr. President, in the course of this debate that any reference has been made to publications charging extravagance in these navy-yards, such charges have been scouted as false and denounced as lies in plain set terms, and this sum of $4,800,000 pointed to as the whole appropriation for navy-yards.

I became somewhat interested in running down some of these things, and I found a paper—I have no doubt that the Senator from Maine and the other members of the Committee on Naval Affairs are familiar with it—which covers in considerable part the charges made in the magazine article referred to and quoted from by the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON]. This is a paper of such recognized merit that I understand the Navy Department has caused it to be placed in the hands of the chief of each of the bureaus of the department, with directions that they study it and endeavor to make improvements and retrenchments, in so far as possible, in their various bureaus, in accordance with the criticisms made in this document. It came into being as follows:

Pay Inspector John A. Mudd, one of the foremost men in the Paymaster-General's Department, holding an important post in New York, was detailed in 1907 to make a special tour of the navy-yards in order to study their economy of operation. Less than a year ago the results of his investigation were made the subject of a paper by him printed in a publication called "Naval Institute," in which selected essays written by officers of the navy find publication.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to this paper in support of the statement which I made that it is almost impossible, or it is at least extremely difficult, for one, however diligent he may be, to take the naval appropriation bill and ascertain where the various appropriations are to be expended, and to show that the confusing and the mixing of these appropriations year after year in the annual appropriation bills have their effect upon the various departments by begetting there a system of confused accounting and bookkeeping, which opens the way to the wildest and most inexcusable extravagance.

I am very certain that Senators who have not had the opportunity to read this paper, which is entitled "The money for the navy," will be interested in the statements made by this expert. On page 49 I was astounded to find this statement:

It is common knowledge that the Secretary, when he directed the bureaus to prepare the estimates for the fiscal year 1908, called for a statement of the approximate amounts expended during the previous year under the principal subheads of the annual appropriations. The Bureau of Supplies and Accounts acknowledged this could not be made, and had no trouble in explaining why, through no fault of its own, it could not give the information. Expenditures had never been recorded according to subheads of appropriations; purchases of supplies for stock had been made under no specific portion of the appropriation involved; and the method of yard manufacture and the common use of stock after a certain period prevented, and the wording of the specifications of the appropriation act, in many cases, positively prevented any segregation, approximating the truth, of expenditures according to subheads of appropriations. Yet the request of the Secretary would seem to be a proper one to a business men.

Mr. President, to quote further from this document and to give it application to one of the matters which came up in the course of this discussion—that is, the amount expended in these various navy-yards—I wish to bring the attention of the Senate back again to the statement of the Senator from Maine. Instead of it costing, as I am certain the Senate was led to believe from the statement made in the course of the debate, this limited amount to maintain the navy-yards and the shore stations appropriated for, I could quote from this paper the following with respect to the appropriations of 1906, which were smaller by many million dollars than the appropriations carried in the pending bill.

It cost—

Says Pay Inspector Mudd—

for the fiscal year 1906 to maintain all the navy-yards and other shore stations $11,115,080.81.

Besides this, there was expended for buildings, chapels, etc., and for machinery at these places (Titles E and F) the sum of $9,589,183.09, making the total of the real maintenance cost of the shore part of the establishment $20,694,263.90. Of course this latter figure does not include the work done at the yards on or for ships; it is solely the cost of keeping the yards in such shape as to fit them for doing their work for the floating part of the establishment. This cost alone of maintaining the shore plant was more than two-thirds of the cost of the floating part, the fleet.

Bear in mind that these twenty and a half millions expended in one year in keeping the fitting-out and repair plant in condition to do work for the fleet are not all the money used at the navy-yards.

Look above—

As before mentioned in this paper—

and there will be noticed an item of five and a half millions, repairs to ships.

I learned, Mr. President, that there was a report made by some officers of the Navy Department who had been delegated to make an investigation with reference to the repairs put upon ships after they have reached a condition where they ought to be thrown aside. I tried to get from the Secretary of the Navy such report and the recommendation that certain ships should be no longer repaired. I was not able to secure that report. Neither was I able to secure the report or the statement in writing made by Admiral Goodrich recommending the discontinuance of the navy-yard at Portsmouth.

I do not wish to do any injustice, but I believe it to be pretty difficult to procure information which tends to show the folly and extravagance of appropriations made upon the plan of this bill. I believe that such information exists in abundance in the department.

Further on this point of expenditures in the navy-yards of the country, the author of this paper says:

An item of five and a half millions, repairs to ships, under titles D and P, all of which work was done at the navy's shore plant. Another half million, spent for work mostly at shore stations, was under Title N, "experiments and tests," which title was charged in 1906 with $498,520.09. Under the manufacture account, Title Z, at the navy-yards, the enormous sum of $22,447,347.02 is charged off; also about three millions and a half of construction work on new ships was done at the yards during the year. So it may be safely stated that over $50,000,000 are used at the shore plant in one year, about half the total appropriation for the navy.

He says further:

This navy-yard expense is one of the most important items in the navy's unfinished business portfolio. The amount involved is enormous.

Now, with respect to the policy pursued in the navy-yards, I quote the following:

Some years ago a department of an important yard become so helplessly entangled in its manufacture and other shop accounts that even expert aid sent on from Washington could not unravel the snarl. Finally everything had to be written off and new books opened. The trouble was the accumulation of years, but it would not have been of more than a quarter's duration had there been an inspector to stop the "cooking" of the accounts.

At another important yard a head of department who had only recently taken charge, in trying to clear up the manufacture account, Title Z, turned over to him, found worse than confusion. There were hundreds of dollars charged to unfinished job orders, where all the research possible could not bring out what the job orders were for which the value had been expended.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was called out of the Chamber for a little while, and I should like to know from what the Senator is reading.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am reading from a paper of Pay Inspector Mudd, who was detailed to examine the navy-yards and report upon them.

Mr. TILLMAN. When was the report made?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Last spring. He was detailed to make an investigation in 1907.

Mr. BACON. By whom?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Detailed by the Secretary of the Navy, I suppose. At any rate, his paper was regarded as important enough, as I stated when the Senator was not present, I think, to be placed in the hands of the chiefs of the bureaus of the Navy Department, with directions to endeavor to make such corrections as were possible under the existing law in accordance with the evils which were shown by this paper to exist in the department.

Mr. TILLMAN. Still there has been no comprehensive investigation by other than one officer, and he investigated only one or two yards.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; I stated that he visited a large number of the yards.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am sorry I did not catch that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will continue. I am sure the Senator will be interested.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to say for the Senator's information, if he has not thought about it, that during the last seven years we have had six Secretaries of the Navy, and, from my own knowledge of naval affairs, this constant change in the head of the department has left things at loose ends in a way. The department has been run as a political machine for the reward of this politician or that rather than as a business part of the Government, and these constant changes of Secretary—the Senator knows who is responsible for them—has produced a condition of paralysis, in a way, of the department as a business department, for the reason that it takes a long while for any new man going into the Navy Department to master the details of the complex machine which is there, created by law.

There are eight bureaus; and a new man, a politician, unacquainted with naval affairs, going into the Navy Department, is necessarily very largely dependent upon the chiefs of bureaus for his action. He never budges an inch without touching a bell and calling a bureau chief in to consult with him if a Representative or Senator comes there about any particular matter. The Secretaries, being dependent, as they have been, upon their bureau chiefs, have not had opportunity to familiarize themselves with the working details of the department.

The whole difficulty is due to what the Senator from Wisconsin referred to a little while ago—politics, politics, politics. How is the Senator going to remedy that? By appointing a commission to take the place of the Senate committee? We are now governed by commissions in a large way. We have had commissions and commissions and commissions and commissions and boards until Congress is practically obsolete, and we fall into the habit of swimming along with the current and yielding to this pressure from the Executive to allow him his own sweet way, and if we resist we are criticised and hounded and howled at and cursed and damned from Dan to Beersheba.

If the Senator has any scheme by which he can stop this maladministration or this squandering of public money, I shall be very happy to cooperate, so far as my own vote and any influence I may possess go, and I think the Senate committee will do likewise. But merely getting up and calling attention to a bad condition of affairs does no good, for, as I point out to him, the real source and cause of it is political; that the Navy Department has been run as a political machine to reward the ambitions of this or that Republican leader. Would it change conditions to appoint a board, to have the President get up one of his—I do not like to say "mutual admiration societies," but they have that appearance to me?

I do not know how we are going to remedy this, unless the Senator will suggest some concrete proposition which will appeal to the common sense of the Senate and of the Congress, so that we will be able to get down to the facts and then legislate intelligently. But what good does it do merely to recite this and that abuse, which can be traced back directly to the President himself, because he has kept the Navy Department in a continual transition, while the appropriations have been increasing from year to year—you may say by leaps and bounds—ten and twenty million dollars. What are we going to do about it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am willing to yield for a reasonable interruption, but not for the entire afternoon.

The Senator says Congress has effaced itself. I have tried and I believe I will be able to make it perfectly clear before I finish that at least the members of the Naval Affairs Committee have not effaced themselves in the appropriations made for navy-yards in their respective States.

Mr. President, I agree with one statement made by the Senator from South Carolina, and that is that there is a condition in the navy-yards which requires change to prevent political administration of that great department and not political administration in a party sense alone, either, but political administration in that sense which never ought to prevail in any of the departments of this Government—relations existing between the Congress and the department other than ought to exist between the legislative department and the executive or administrative department of the Government.

There has been a controversy for many years—something like twenty-five years—to put an end to the real evil which exists in the Navy Department. The Navy Department exists not for itself, but to maintain a fleet to take care of this country in case of war. The Navy Department and the enormous expenditures which the people of this Nation make to sustain it can be justified in no way except by creating and maintaining a fleet that shall be a protection to the United States under all conditions.

Mr. President, as I understand the conditions existing in the Navy Department—they were set forth some years ago; first, I think, by Mr. Secretary Whitney—there are certain bureaus—the Bureau of Ordnance, the Bureau of Construction, the Bureau of Steam Engineering, the Bureau of Yards and Docks—I may not cover them all, but there are some five or six. Each of these bureaus has a chief. That chief is supreme in the control of all the business transacted in his bureau.

There has been built up as a result of this distribution of business in the Navy Department a bureaucratic system of conducting business that practically takes it out of the hands of the Secretary of the Navy; and since the Senator from South Carolina has introduced this subject, I am going to present some authority on it. I hold in my hand a paper entitled "What is wrong with the navy?"

Mr. TILLMAN. Who is the author, please?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is written by the editor of Army and Navy Life, and compiled, in part, from editorials which, I think, appeared in that publication, but largely from the reports of the Secretaries of the Navy. A board of officers, in 1883, made a report, from which the following extract is taken:

> Hence we conclude that, to organize our navy-yards on a just and permanent basis, to consolidate their several plants, to introduce thrift in the management and promptness in the methods of doing the work, with a proper system of accountability—to secure, in short, in each of our navy-yards unification, method, economy, and dispatch, with an administration of its own affairs agreeable to the principles of business as understood in civic life * * * it is absolutely necessary to begin with the Navy Department itself.

In his report to Congress in 1885 Secretary Whitney said this with respect to the matter:

> Seeing the ill-advised and inconsiderate manner in which important steps are necessarily taken by me under the present system, I feel certain that a similar record of mismanagement or wasteful expenditure of injudicious and ill-advised disposition of public moneys might be made under any Secretary under the present system.

His successor, Mr. Tracy, complained that the distribution of authority among the bureaus in the Navy Department so divided the responsibility that there could be no business methods established for the conduct of that great department.

Secretary Long said in his annual report:

> Such a system is, in practical administration, cumbrous and expensive, and from its very nature tends to develop controversies respecting the scope of each bureau's duties and to occasion friction, delay, and want of harmony in doing whatever approaches border lines of jurisdiction. * * * No private business is run on such a wasteful and inharmonious plan.

The estimates for appropriations come to the Committee on Naval Affairs from the heads of these various bureaus. The Secretary of the Navy is not in a position to overrule the chief of one of these bureaus in the estimates which he makes for his bureau. He has not the information upon which to do so. He is absolutely dependent upon the chief of the bureau. Each one of these bureaus strives to get as large appropriations as it can; there is rivalry between them. That begets extravagance.

President Roosevelt said in his message in 1903:

> We need the establishment by law of a body of trained officers who shall exercise a systematic control of the military affairs of the navy and be the authorized advisers of the Secretary concerning it.

Secretary Moody, in his annual report, said:

> It clearly follows, therefore, that there should be some military man or men charged with the duty of the collection and collation of information and the giving of responsible advice on military affairs. The organization which lacks this feature is defective in a vital part. Bureau chiefs * * * are engrossed in the administration of their respective bureaus, and hesitate to assume duties which by law are not imposed upon them.

Whenever a complaint which involves the Bureau of Construction comes from the commander of any battle ship, the complaint goes to the Secretary of the Navy, and by him is transmitted, of course, as it must be, to the chief of this bureau. It may be an arraignment or criticism of that chief and of the administration of his bureau, and yet he is the man to whom the Secretary is forced to send the complaint for report. No one else in authority having any technical knowledge is at hand to advise the Secretary of the Navy in order that he may determine whether the criticism made by the commander of the ship shall be sustained or the defense put up by the chief of this bureau shall prevail.

All of the Secretaries of the Navy, so far as I have been able to gather from an examination of the records for a period of some twenty-five years, have advised the formation of a board of experts, such as every other great navy of the world has, to stand as advisers to the civil head of the Navy Department and to pass upon the questions that arise between those who are taking care of the fleet at sea and those who equip that fleet for service.

Mr. President, if there were such an authority—and there has been a struggle now, I say, for twenty-five years to get Congress to assent to the establishment of such an authority—it would be a check to the making of such appropriations as appear in the pending bill. We should then have a disinterested body of men, entirely competent to say where the navy-yards ought to be located, instead of leaving it to Senators and Representatives, who have interests which must naturally bias their judgment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I am not in error, every navy-yard that we have—Portsmouth, Boston, New York, League Island, Norfolk, Mare Island—was established before any Senator in this Chamber became a Member of this body. The navy-yard at Charleston was established in 1901, or it was changed from Beaufort to Charleston—Port Royal, we will call it. They had a naval station at Port Royal, and the question arose as to whether it was advisable to continue to develop that station or to change it to Charleston, if Charleston was the better place; and the board of naval officers, whose names I gave yesterday, were appointed by the Navy Department, not one of whom I had ever seen or known or had had anything to do with; and they were sent to compare the two places and designate which one was the better.

Does the Senator think it is therefore justifiable in him to charge that the Senators on the Naval Affairs Committee are responsible for the establishment of any of these yards, when, as I have pointed out, every one of them except Charleston was created long, long ago? I believe there is a new one on the Pacific coast, at Puget Sound, but I do not recall exactly when it was established. It is of recent date; probably within the last ten years. While there is too much politics in the Navy Department, the Senator ought at least to be fair enough not to undertake to put blame where it does not belnog.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to be fair in this discussion. In answer to the question—the only question contained in the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, as to whether this board could have decided differently—I answer I think not. They were given the choice of Port Royal or Charleston, as stated by the Senator from South Carolina, and there can be no doubt that they decided upon the better place as between the two. But, Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. So far as that is concerned, it is a better place as between that and any other city on the south Atlantic coast, as shown by the coast survey chart.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator from South Carolina is mistaken.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the Senator indicate what other port on the south Atlantic is equal to Charleston.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is not Pensacola better than Charleston?

Mr. TILLMAN. Pensacola is on the Gulf, way round a thousand miles from Charleston by sea. I have nothing against Pensacola.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I suppose not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want Pensacola built up and I want Charleston built up. I do not want all the money we pay in taxes to go north.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator now has simply furnished proof, as he has heretofore in this Chamber, of the fact that there is a struggle locally for this money; and that is the basis of my criticism of the plan of the bill. He does not want the money to go north. He wants it to go south.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want my share and no more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; that is it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am tired of seeing the South treated as though the war ended last year. It is forty-three years since the war ended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was the position the Senator took here some time ago, when he said if this money was to be——

Mr. DIXON. I have it here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator has the exact quotation, I will use it.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will tell you what I said.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have it right here.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said if stealing was to be done, I wanted my share of it; and I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have right here what the Senator said. That is not all the Senator from South Carolina said. On the 1st of March, 1899, speaking of one of these naval appropriation bills, he said:

> This bill is loaded down with expansion in every navy-yard. I am trying to get a little for Port Royal; because, if you are going to steal, I want my share.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that contrary to the human nature which obtains in Vermont?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not at all, Mr. President. I am contending that you have the finest exhibition of human nature in this Committee on Naval Affairs that was ever seen; and the Senator from South Carolina is giving evidence of it right here. He is aiding me materially, and I am very grateful to him.

He said further, on the subject of the transfer to Charleston, that it was very material to him. He said:

> My main object in all this matter is to endeavor to get a first-class navy-yard, not a station, at some eligible point on the South Atlantic, and to have the South receive some recognition in naval affairs.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that bad? Is that wrong?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President, it seems to me that is not the basis upon which the public money should be distributed. It ought to be distributed upon the basis which is recognized by naval authorities—that of military necessity, that of providing for the very best maintenance of a navy.

Mr. President, if the right policy had been pursued we would not have, as we have to-day, a large number of these navy-yards and not a single naval base, not a place on all our coast where, as you might be compelled to do by the necessities of war, you can take in a fleet and give it an overhauling and take it out in twenty-four hours. Suppose our fleet, which is coming back——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to permit me to go on. I do not yield for the moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am willing to submit to a reasonable amount of interruption, Mr. President.

Our fleet is about to return home. I think it is expected in another week. It is proposed, as has been stated here in the course of this debate, that that fleet shall—and it must, I suppose, in order to have the overhauling which is necessary after its long trip—be taken into the navy-yards along the Atlantic coast, distributed from Portsmouth on the north to New Orleans on the south.

But supposing, Mr. President, that this fleet was being followed by a hostile fleet. Suppose it was necessary, as it will be, that our fleet should go into dock and be repaired and overhauled. What would be our situation? The fleet would have to be distributed all along the Atlantic coast. There is not a single place where that fleet could be kept together and docked and in any reasonable length of time put again into the water.

The fleet of the enemy would destroy our fleet in sections and we would have no chance at all. In making a comparison between the expenditures made in this country and Great Britain for maintaining and improving navy-yards over a series of years the Senator from Maine made what seemed to be a very creditable showing for this country, but when you examine that comparison a little it seems to me that it is the best evidence in the world that our policy has been wrong. Moreover, the comparison is misleading. The Senator said that the English have only three large yards, and he says that in fourteen years they have appropriated $126,000,000, while we have appropriated for public works in navy-yards to this time $51,000,000. Here, again, we have the use of that term "public works," which limits the expenditure to the improvements under a single bureau for one purpose, but which does not recognize the money which goes into the navy-yards through other bureaus for countless items distributed through other portions of this bill. Such a statement is obviously not a fair comparison, for it includes only a part of our expenditures on account of navy-yards.

The Senator said that the British have only three large yards. I have consulted the best authorities which I could find on the condition of the British yards, and I find the following facts in Jane's "Fighting Ships," 1908 edition, which is a recognized authority on naval statistics:

"At Devonport, England, they have a navy-yard in which there are 4 docks; at Portsmouth, a navy-yard in which there are 17 docks; at Chatham, a navy-yard in which there are 11 docks; at Sheerness, a navy-yard in which there are 5 docks; at Rosyth, a navy-yard in which there is 1; at Haulbowline, a navy-yard in which there are 2; at Pembroke, they have 1 dry dock, but for second-class cruisers; at Malta, they have a navy-yard in which there are 6 dry docks; at Gibraltar, a navy-yard in which there are 3; and at Hongkong, a navy-yard in which there are 4. In all, they have 54 docks. Besides these Great Britain maintains a base at Portland for the Channel fleet, containing 1,500 acres of inclosed harbor having a minimum depth of 30 feet. And another base at Dover, which is a submarine base, containing 610 acres having moorings for 16 battle ships, 5 large cruisers, 7 second-class cruisers, and 4 torpedo-boat destroyers."

They have something to show for their expenditures. What have we got? We have 17 docks in all our navy-yards and more than half of them are not suitable for docking modern battle ships. At Philadelphia we have two docks. Only one will take our largest battle ships; the other will take battle ships of the smaller class. At New York we have three docks completed. Two of them will take our largest battle ships; the third one is for smaller vessels. There is a fourth dock building that will take, when completed, the largest ships contemplated. Boston has two docks. One will take the largest ships we now have; the second one is a small dock which will take only small cruisers. Portsmouth has one large dock. It did have a sectional dock. I think the sectional dock is in such a condition that it is never used now. Norfolk has three docks. It has one which will take our big battle ships, one for small cruisers, and an intermediate dock. Port Royal has one dock which will take ships of about 10,000 or 11,000 tons, but it can not be used. Charleston has one dock, I understand, not yet completed. I may be misinformed about that.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is completed and in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will take a 21,000-ton battle ship. Key West has no dock. Pensacola has a floating dock that will take small cruisers. It can not take a battle ship or even a large cruiser. New Orleans has a floating dock that will take a battle ship of about 12,000 or 15,000 tons. Mare Island has two docks—one that will take a battle ship, if she can get into it; and the other is for smaller vessels, cruisers of 5,000 or 6,000 tons.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has the official figures before him. Will he permit me to inquire how many docks we have that will take battle ships of 26,000 tons?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not certain about that.

Mr. BACON. That is a very material inquiry, in view of the vote we have just taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the chairman of the committee to say day before yesterday, when that matter was under discussion, that we had no dock that would take one of these 26,000-ton battle ships. I may be wrong in my recollection of his statement, but I think he did make that statement.

Now, Mr. President, I come back again to the point from which I was diverted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the bad management of our navy-yards. I invite the attention of Senators again to the paper from which I was reading. If there is an earnest desire on the part of Senators to reduce appropriations and to show something for the money that is expended, then we will have to radically change the form and kind of appropriation bill which we pass from year to year for the naval establishment.

Pay Inspector Mudd, in making his study of the expenditures in the several navy-yards, selected three navy-yards and compared the cost of the output. In this report the yards are not named; they are designated as "blue," "red," and "green." I suppose Senators will readily understand why this form of designation was used by this officer. He says:

Systematic comparison of the cost of similar work done at the various yards has never been made by the department. Some comparisons will be given here to show what a field there is for work in this line; and it is thought that the results exposed will indicate that sincere work will accomplish enormous economy in yard shopwork and that connected with the general upkeep of the yards.

* * * * * * *

Three navy-yards, designated as the "blue," "red," and "green" yard, respectively, will be handled in the comparisons. The great departments of Construction and Repair and Steam Engineering will be the ones used in the comparisons between the yards. The blue yard will be arbitrarily taken as standard. The work performed during the fiscal year 1906 will be that compared.

* * * * * * *

What the yards should be judged by are the cost of the "output" and the expense of maintaining the plant from which it came. Output work is charged to one of the five titles, A, D, P, N, and Z—original construction, repairs to hull and machinery, repairs to equipage, experiments and tests, and manufacture.

* * * * * * *

Under the present system of navy-yard management labor can be brought into a yard as long as there is money to pay for it, whether there is honest work there for it or not.

Now, following out the comparison which Mr. Mudd made, he gives the following as to the difference in the cost of the output in the three yards in which the comparison was instituted:

These last results show, taking the material used in "output" work as a measure, it costs 47.1 per cent more at red than at blue to maintain the working plant, in the construction and repair department, to perform the same class of work, and that at green it cost 326.3 per cent more.

* * * * * * *

This means that output work at Red was 22.9 per cent, and at Green 91.9 per cent more costly than at Blue.

* * * * * * *

After the writer had invented his method and made the preceding comparisons, it occurred to him to compare the cost of similar pieces of work turned out at the yards—that is, articles of ship's equipage manufactured under Title Z, one of the elements of the "output" work. The work of four different yards, including Blue and Red, was compared.

The boats for the battle ships are built, as to kind, on the same model and of the same material. Recently at one yard it cost $1,890.63 to make a 30-foot steam cutter, while at another, not many miles away, it cost $2,684.62 to build exactly the same kind of boat to put on board the same kind of battle ship. A 30-foot barge cost $671.08 at one yard and $1,151 at another. Several 30-foot cutters cost, on the average, $598.61 at one yard and $848.13 at another. A 14-foot dingey cost $104.08 at one yard, while at another the same kind of a boat was turned out for $153.61.

The same year, the same season—

A 16-foot dingey cost $104.17 at one yard and $196.34 at another—pretty close to twice as much, it will be observed. A 20-foot dingey cost $217.89 at one yard and $362.44 at another. A 30-foot gig whaleboat cost $509.38 at one yard, and the same kind of boat, for the same kind of service, was turned out at another yard for the euphonious sum of $888.80. A 30-foot whaleboat cost $559.79 at one yard and $740 at another. A 14-foot punt cost $63.73 at one yard and $95.12 at another.

In the articles of output for the boats there was found even a greater variation of prices. For the standard 30-foot cutters, one of the yards had made boathooks for 50 cents apiece, while another yard had made exactly the same article at a cost of $3 each.

There is something inherently wrong in a system that will produce such results as these. This expert accountant says that the evil starts with the manner in which the appropriations are mixed and the phraseology used in the different items of these appropriation bills; that it is impossible to conform or comply in the bookkeeping with the terms of the legislation making an appropriation and have a system of accounting that will be any check upon extravagance. Legislation that is itself unintelligible and confusing can only result in a system that is a temptation to laxity and wrongdoing.

Awning stanchions were $1.50 at one yard and $3.50 at another. Rudders were $6 at one yard and $10 at another. A tiller was $1 at one yard and $3 at another. Oh ye sailors, think of an ordinary boat tiller costing $3! Why, a landlubber could buy a lawn mower for that money; and think of the gears, knives, rollers, and other things in the mower. Only the other day the writer bought, over the retail counter, for his own use a pick handle. It is a handsome piece of finished work of its kind, made of hickory; it cost 20 cents. Cut it in half, and with a little whittling, it would make two fine tillers.

Turning to furniture: A mahogany desk for a cabin cost $136.76 at one yard, while at another, one made for a sister ship cost $190, there being no cents wasted on this latter price. An oak desk cost $112.07 at one yard and $163.30 at another. Toilet racks for officers' rooms, of which there are more than 40 made for each battle ship, cost $14.60 each at one yard, while at another exactly the same article was turned out for the neat round sum of $20.

Each officer's room, on recent ships, is provided with a metal box for storing full-dress uniforms and other valuable clothing that is not in everyday use. The boxes are made after a standard pattern and are perfectly plain. Forty-two of these cases cost at one of the yards $567, while at another a similar number cost $1,250.76.

There is a small wooden ditty box provided for each man on board ship, in which to stow odds and ends, such as writing material, sewing gear, letters, etc. They are made after a standard pattern. It cost $1,899.17 to make 808 of these boxes at a certain yard, while at another a similar number were completed for the tidy sum of $4,259.66.

A chopping block, a simple and prosaic article of ship's equipage, cost $3 at one yard and $25 at another. A meat block cost $4 at one yard and $10 at another. An alcohol chest, to hold 75 gallons, cost $71.23 at one yard and $131.61 at another, while the same kind of chest, but to contain only 50 gallons, cost at one yard $59.22 and at another $120. A carpenter's chest cost $18 at one yard and $34 at another. A lot of deck chests averaged $18 at one yard and $35 at another.

A number of these same statements were printed in the article to which the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] referred when he was addressing the Senate, and it was promptly denounced as false here on this floor. Evidently the writer of that article had gone to the same sources in making his investigation that this naval expert had access to in making his investigation the results of which are presented in this paper.

On page 90 of this paper, in conclusion, it is said:

Government work has a force entering into it that is not found in commercial life, necessarily, and that is patriotism. Pride may be a force in commercial work, but we have that also in government work. In addition, and above that, is patriotism. Any part of the naval organization that can be swerved either to the right or left out of the logical path toward economical efficiency, under the influence of political blandishment or terrorism, should not be tolerated by even the humble workers.

I leave it to Senators to make their own application of the language used here.

The deadliest poison that an administrative officer in the navy can imbibe into his official system is the game of politics as related to the navy. The moment he begins to play the game, no matter what the stake may be—supplies, new buildings, self-prominence, or what not—the economical efficiency of the service, to the extent of that officer's power as part of the machinery of the organization, begins to suffer. And no matter who the politician may be, when he takes a personal, familiar hand in naval affairs, beyond the barriers of official duty, through the above-mentioned power of blandishment or terrorism, he increases the "costs." The intercourse between Congress and the navy should be formally official, and never, under any circumstances familiar.

If I have followed, Mr. President, the history of this long struggle of twenty-five years to reorganize the Navy Department and to install there an independent and competent authority to pass upon these questions of large expenditures, the location of navy-yards, the construction of battle ships, the size of battle ships, the issues that are raised between the commanders of the fleet and the bureaus of Construction, Ordnance, Steam Engineering, and the like—if I have read aright the history of that struggle to secure legislation to establish some such power there, and I think I have, I have been forced to the conclusion that the attitude of Congress has been hostile to the establishment of such a reform; that there has been a constant upholding of this irresponsible bureau system; that the maintenance of that bureau system gives excessive power to each one of those chiefs and magnifies the importance of their position, makes them supreme and autocratic, puts them into almost equally divided authority with the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Mr. President, it is barely possible that there may be some relation between that condition and the fact that the report of the general board in favor of laying aside a large number of the old war vessels and discontinuing the expenditure of large sums of money upon them was ignored, and the fact that these vessels are still going to various navy-yards to be repaired may find some explanation in the relations which have grown up between Congress and these bureau officers, plainly hinted at in this report. I say, Mr. President, that such is simply a natural and logical result of leaving the control of these appropriations for naval establishment in the hands of Senators and Representatives who are more or less interested because such appropriations go so largely into their States and ultimately to their constituents.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to mean by his statement, which I am listening to with great interest, that some battle ships that ought to be put out of commission are kept afloat merely to give work to certain navy-yards? Is that the inference I am to draw from the Senator's statement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do mean exactly that. I believe that there are old war vessels—and I believe that a thorough investigation would disclose them by name—that should long since have ceased to receive a dollar of the large sums of money that, from year to year, are expended upon them for repairs.

Mr. President, I do not mean to say that that is not exactly the condition that would have grown up under this system no matter who was on the committee. My criticism is wholly impersonal. It is directed against a wrong system. Manifestations of this system are seen in the distribution made of the appropriations under the river and harbor bill. There is the same eager strife to get the largest possible appropriation for the harbor represented by the Member on the committee. I believe that the whole plan is wrong. I believe that disinterested Senators and disinterested Representatives should compose the membership of these committees. Of course, the Senators representing the various States which, more or less, will be benefited by the appropriations should be given the fullest and the fairest hearing to present their claims. But those claims should rest solely upon the ground of the broadest public policy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I dislike very much by my silence to seem to acquiesce in the last statement of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I can not subscribe to the idea that because a man happens to live in the lake region, where shipping is important and the condition of our rivers and harbors a matter of the highest consequence, he should be debarred from having an active part in the make-up and consideration of river and harbor appropriations. Such a thought does violence to the communities represented by such Senator or Representative. I think the best results would not necessarily be obtained by following the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin. Much as I dislike to disagree with him, I still believe that the Representatives from Wisconsin and the Representatives from Michigan are more competent to determine the necessities of our people than would be the Senator from Nevada, who has no river or harbor within his State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, it depends somewhat, I think, upon one's point of view. It seems to me——

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FRYE. Only a word. If the theory of the Senator from Wisconsin was carried into practice in regard to the Committee on Commerce, the whole 17 members of that committee would have to be taken from the State of Nevada. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course that would not be quite feasible. The Committee on Commerce does not report an annual appropriation bill carrying $137,000,000 to be distributed largely to the constituents of the Senators on that committee. Mr. President, there is not, it seems to me, any opportunity for difference of opinion on the proposition that when men are voting upon the distribution of money for improvements of any sort, whether rivers and harbors or in navy-yards—expenditures in their respective States—they can not bring to bear upon the determination of that question the same unbiased judgment that they would exercise were the money not to go to their constituents.

The same thing is seen in the distribution of the moneys that go to the erection of public buildings. You get a logrolling arrangement between the members of the committees and Members of the different branches of Congress that are benefited by it, and they stand together to put through the appropriation.

Mr. President, I am perfectly well aware that Senators are reluctant to yield the places they have, which give them the power of determining where these appropriations are to go. It seems to me that it is a plain proposition that a board of disinterested naval experts should determine the location of our naval bases, which would be all important and possibly vital to the national safety in war. Such a board would be vastly better able to determine that than are the Members of this or any other legislative body, particularly when the Members sitting upon the committee and making the appropriations and fixing the amounts that are to be expended are voting to expend it in their respective States, to give employment to their constituents, and to take a measure of prosperity into the sections where these great appropriations go.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. DIXON. Did I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say a moment ago that in making up the House Committee on Naval Affairs Speaker CANNON refused to appoint men who had navy-yards in their districts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have seen it so stated. The Senator from Montana was very recently a member of that body. He may have examined the committee assignments in the other House, and he may himself have some information upon that subject. But I have seen it stated and published quite widely that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in making committee assignments, had refused to appoint on the Committee on Naval Affairs any Representative who had a navy-yard in his district. [A pause.] The Senator from Montana says that the record of the House assignments shows that to be a fact. So it would seem, Mr. President, that I am not entirely alone in my view as expressed here, that a more just and equitable distribution of this money, upon a better principle, can be attained by placing the control of the appropriation and its distribution in hands other than those of Senators representing States where the money is to be expended.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether he would have that same rule apply to the Committee on Military Affairs, and if it would prohibit anyone from service on the Committee on Military Affairs who had a military reservation or a fort in his State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Possibly it could not be applied to the expenditures of the military department.

Mr. FLINT. Would the Senator from Wisconsin have all the committees of the Senate constructed in the same way?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Those are so widely distributed and the amounts are so small that the same objection does not apply that prevails, as it seems to me, in reference to expenditures under the naval bill, which is now under consideration.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. MONEY. I suppose the Senator, of course, does not want to leave the Senate under a misapprehension of the facts. The Congressional Directory shows that there is on the House Committee on Naval Affairs one Representative from Massachusetts, one from New York, two from Pennsylvania, one from Louisiana, and one from Alabama; and each one of those States has a navy-yard.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not quite understand the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. I said the Senator had stated that he understood that Speaker CANNON would not appoint any man on the Committee on Naval Affairs who had a navy-yard in his district or within his State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had seen it so stated, and the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], who has just looked at the record, confirms what is my impression about it.

Mr. MONEY. I do not know about the districts, for I do not know how the districts were organized, but the Congressional Directory shows that New York has one representative——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, but not upon——

Mr. MONEY. Pennsylvania 2, Massachusetts 1, Alabama 1, and Louisiana 1 on that committee, and they have navy-yards in their States, though I do not know whether or not they are within the districts of the Representatives.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator will find that the navy-yards are not in the districts represented by those gentlemen; at least the Senator from Montana, who is familiar with the matter, so states.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to read the list of the names of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House who represent States where navy-yards are located. First, Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER, of Pennsylvania; then Hon. S. E. MUDD, of Maryland, where there is a naval school, but no navy-yard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me interrupt the Senator from California to ask him whether there is any navy-yard or naval school in the district represented by the Representatives in question?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. ROBERTS, of Massachusetts, represents the district in which the navy-yard at Charlestown is located; Mr. BATES, of Pennsylvania——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is not it. The Senator from California does not understand the question I propounded to him. I ask him whether the navy-yard in question with reference, for instance, to the Representative from Massachusetts, is located in the district of that Representative?

Mr. PERKINS. Navy-yards are located in their respective States; whether in the particular districts, I am not advised.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will answer that——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. ROBERTS represents the district in which the navy-yard in Massachusetts is situated, does he not?

Mr. DIXON. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator corrects me about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. I stand corrected. He is certainly a very near neighbor to the navy-yard.

Mr. LODGE. Charlestown, where the navy-yard is situated, is in another district. Mr. ROBERTS's home is in Chelsea, which is next to Charlestown.

Mr. TILLMAN. Charlestown; not Charleston, S. C. Mr. LEGARE is from the Charleston district. I do not know whether or not he is on the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House, but he generally gets what he wants at that end of the line. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. FLINT. There is a good deal of force in what the Senator from Wisconsin has said. I merely want to call his attention to how far-reaching his idea would be in the event it was carried out. Take, for instance, the Committee on Agriculture. Suppose all Senators interested in agricultural matters were prohibited from serving on that committee——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. O Mr. President, the Senator from California can hardly be serious.

Mr. FLINT. I am serious; and if the Senator will permit me, the agricultural bill carries appropriations in reference to various institutions for various States. That is a matter of influence, as the Senator has described in his remarks, just as much as the location of a navy-yard, and I have no doubt that many of those institutions have been located in the wrong place.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLINT. The same is true of Public Buildings Committee and every other committee of the Senate. If the Senator's idea were carried out, it would simply be impossible to do business in the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amount of appropriation which the agricultural bill carries to any particular district or to any particular State would be very inconsiderable compared with the amount that is placed in a navy-yard within a given time.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Wait a moment. Take, for instance, Mare Island, in California. Let me call the attention of the Senator from California to the amount of money that has gone into that navy-yard in the nine years ending in 1907.

Improvement and additions for nine years, $5,519,265.91; general maintenance, $7,053,522.46; in nine years, $12,572,788.37. In that time the total value of the work turned out from that navy-yard was but $8,858,946.53.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I would answer that by saying that probably other shipbuilding yards which have very much larger amounts invested have not turned out as much work as the Mare Island Navy-Yard.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And up to the present time, after that entire expenditure, they never have been able to take but one battle ship into that navy-yard and dock it there, and that battle ship, I believe, ran aground in going in. That was the Missouri. That is a fair sort of illustration, Mr. President. Of course, you can raise the question about the distribution of these small sums of money in the different States—as has just been suggested to me by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]—of garden seeds, and all that sort of thing, and make it appear somewhat petty; but when you come to consider the appropriations that have been made in such enormous sums for navy-yards, upon which the returns seems so unjustifiable, it seems to me that it gives a force to the suggestion which I have made here, from which no Senator can escape.

Mr. FLINT. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. While I am on this subject, and before it passes from my mind—I am speaking this afternoon with considerable difficulty, because I am not well—I want to direct attention to the results in several of the other large navy-yards, where it seems to me the appropriations are wanting in justification, as shown in the statement which I just made.

At League Island, Philadelphia, the improvements and additions in the same nine years was $6,707,432.62; general maintenance, nine years, $5,358,599.60, making a total in nine years of $12,066,032.22. Now, the total of the work done there in those nine years is but $5,133,880.97. That is the return that has been made on that investment.

At Norfolk the total amount in improvements and maintenance in nine years was $13,156,291.15, and the total of work done but $9,605,293.93. That is the return made upon that investment.

At Port Royal the total amount expended in improvements and maintenance in the nine years was $1,693,597.60, and the total work done in nine years, $128,494.23.

At Charleston the total amount expended in the six years ending in 1907 was $2,592,829.30; the total work done, none.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do, for a question.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has just made a statement with reference to Mare Island Navy-Yard, to a statement in the RECORD of yesterday, presented by my colleague [Mr. PERKINS], showing the various vessels that have been repaired at the Mare Island Navy-Yard and been docked there; also a report from the commandant of Mare Island showing the vessels that have been there. I think the Senator will find out that his statement was not correct if he will read this report as handed in by my colleague yesterday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was talking of battle ships. Other smaller ships have been there, but only one battle ship. Now, this statement, Mr. President, is taken directly from the report of the Secretary of the Navy. There is not any possibility of any error in the figures which I present.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator at what navy-yard the bulk of the work during the past five years has been done, and what the amount of that work was as compared with the expenditures of the navy-yard itself?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The figures which I have taken from the reports here—the total figures for each year—are in Appendix B of the report of the Secretary of the Navy for the fiscal year 1907, and are given for each year.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is the Senator able to state the navy-yard at which the bulk of the work during the past ten years has been done, and the amount of it, as compared with the expenditure upon the yard itself at that place?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I can give the Senator, I think, the totals for each yard.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I simply make that inquiry because I am at a loss to know how there could be so great a disproportion between the amount expended at the navy-yards for construction and improvements as compared with the amount of work put out by each one of those navy-yards. During the past ten years we have probably expended on the navy pretty nearly a billion dollars, of which I imagine, roughly speaking, at least half a billion or more must have been spent at the navy-yards, and the output of the navy-yards to which the Senator has referred is so very small for a period of ten years that it must leave a very large proportion to be attached to some particular navy-yard, or else the statistics to which the Senator refers are misleading.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. These figures are absolutely authentic; they are taken from the official report of the Secretary of the Navy. I can give the Senator from Nevada, from the additions made from this table, the total amount in each of the navy-yards for improvements and additions and maintenance, and the total value of the output of the navy-yards.

Portsmouth, total for improvements and additions and maintenance for the period of nine years ending in 1907, $8,905,-214.09; total work for nine years, $3,459,400.05.

For Boston, improvements and additions for the nine years, $6,488,190.71; general maintenance for the nine years, $7,238,-246.59, or a total in nine years of $13,726,437.30, and a total output of work during that period of $8,855,043.73.

At New York, for improvements and additions and general maintenance for nine years, the total was $24,790,312.02, and the total output $20,262,552.22. I think I gave the same figures for League Island, Norfolk, Port Royal, Charleston, and Mare Island.

Mr. President, there is existing to-day a general board, which, I believe, is appointed by the Secretary of the Navy as a sort of adviser. In the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1908 the Secretary quotes from the recommendation of this general board as follows:

The general board, after having carefully considered the matter, recommended that as a matter of general policy the work of repairing and refitting our ships should be concentrated in the large navy-yards; that as far as possible the smaller and comparatively unnecessary yards should not be further developed; and that if opportunity presents they be done away with; that the policy should be to develop the navy-yards at New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Puget Sound, and Mare Island to their full capacity for the repair and maintenance of ships; that the present facilities at Portsmouth and Boston should be utilized, but that larger facilities at these yards, in addition to the present equipment, are not urgent; that the development of the fresh-water basin at the navy-yard, Philadelphia, should continue for the reason that it is the only point on the Atlantic coast where battle ships can be placed in reserve or laid up in fresh water; that Charleston should not be further developed at this time, except as a torpedo-boat base; and that it is not desirable to attempt to further develop Pensacola, Key West, or New Orleans until Guantanamo has been equipped with repair shops and the necessary docking facilities for docking battle ships of the heaviest class.

That is the recommendation of the general board, which the Secretary quotes with the following approval:

The general board regards it as a matter of the first importance that Guantanamo be developed, for the reason that it will be required to defend the Panama Canal and the large interests of the United States in the West Indies; that Guantanamo is a naturally strategic base, possessing all the elements of location, area, and depth of water.

In all of these recommendations the department heartily concurs. The cost of maintenance (and for full and further particulars reference is made to the last annual report of the department) is out of all proportion to the value of the work done at some of the navy-yards. In the interest of economy, therefore, work should be concentrated at the principal yards and appropriations should be made for the purpose of placing those yards in first-class condition. The department has not undertaken to do away with or close any navy-yard, but, as far as lay within its power, has directed its energies to building up what it regards as the most important yards.

Now, Mr. President, as I remember, a few years ago an appropriation of $250,000 or $300,000 was made for improvements at Guantanamo. Since that time not one dollar has been appropriated to continue the work. It is going to destruction, and yet I do not believe a naval authority can be found in this country who would not support the development of that point for strategic reasons, and the expenditure of such sums of money as would make it a naval base. I submit to Senators that the failure to appropriate there, in the face of the recommendation of the general board, of the Secretary of the Navy year after year, and when all the officials of the navy urge it upon the attention of Congress and the country as important to the preservation of our interests in Panama; I submit the fact that we are permitting the investment already made there to rot and go to pieces, while the naval appropriation bill, year after year, comes in here without a dollar to carry out these recommendations, is the strongest proof in the world of the statement and the argument which I have made here this afternoon, that our whole system of making these appropriations has become a political one.

There is no Senator representing Guantanamo on this floor. There is no Senator here to urge upon the Naval Affairs Committee the importance of making that appropriation. It has no advocates except such as come from a purely disinterested source, basing their recommendations upon military principle.

Mr. President, I believe the time has come for a complete change.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me right here? I do not want to interrupt him if it is at all disagreeable to him, but I do want to know something more about Guantanamo.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. I will ask him, as there is no Senator here representing that important point, whether an estimate has been submitted by the department for expenditures at that point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is a question which it will be necessary for me to pass to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator from Wisconsin object to my asking the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I will be very glad to have the information brought out.

Mr. MONEY. I will be very glad, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, if the Senator from Maine, who has charge of the bill, will say whether or not the Department of the Navy has recommended an expenditure for Guantanamo—for a dockyard, a navy-yard, or anything else.

Mr. HALE. At times there have been recommendations of that kind and at other times there have been no recommendations. There have been some appropriations made. At one time the then Secretary of the Navy and other persons representing both Houses visited this site, and I know for myself I came to the conclusion that it was an exposed, dangerous position, and that if hostilities should occur on the Spanish main, it would be subject to attack and would be unprotected from a hostile fleet. Since then—all these appropriations have come first before the House committee—the House committee, which has investigated it, has declined to recommend and report any appropriation.

I have no doubt there are certain men under the influence of the department who would like to spend $30,000,000 at Guantanamo. They would like to spend $30,000,000 at Olongapo; and yet the investigations that have been made have convinced parties who have looked into it that that is not a desirable expenditure of public money.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me, several Senators have asked me, with reference to what course they would take, what is likely to be the order of business for the rest of the day or for the evening. Can the Senator, so far as he is concerned, indicate to me, if he is entirely prepared to do so, whether there is likelihood of the Senate being kept here until a late hour this evening or for a night session?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I was about to conclude when the Senator from Mississippi rose. I have spoken with very great difficulty this afternoon. I am not well.

Mr. HALE. I will say now in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin that that is just the reply I made—that I thought the Senator was about concluding when the Senator from Mississippi drew him out again.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had not the information the Senator from Mississippi asked for. I knew that the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Metcalf, had made this recommendation, or indorsed the recommendation of the General Board; and I do know, further, from other information which has come to me, that practically all the commanders and admirals, the strong men of our navy, very generally agree that this appropriation should be made for Guantanamo; that it should be made to represent, with reference to our country and our interests, what Gibraltar does with respect to the English. And while it will take some time, I have no doubt, to awaken public sentiment and public interest to such an extent as to represent that idea and principle in this bill, while I expect we shall not readily and at once come to a settlement of the matter of these appropriations upon correct principles, I believe the time is coming when the appropriations made for naval affairs will be based upon the recommendations of the highest naval authorities in this country, and that such will be the force of this feeling upon this branch and the other branch of Congress that the interests of States and of sections, of the North and the South, and of politics will give way before it. If no other good has come out of this debate of now practically three days upon the pending bill, it has drawn public attention to these questions of appropriations, to the extravagance of expenditure, to the waste which takes place in the navy-yards.

This waste is shown upon an authority which can not be disputed; it has so impressed the Navy Department, when reported to its attention, that all of the heads of bureaus were appealed to to give their best thought and their best attention to the correction of these abuses—in so far as they could do so without legislation—which this paper of its expert had made so manifest in all of the navy-yards of our country.

Mr. President, it occurs to me to say, in conclusion, that I think a part of the evil which results from this method of legislation arises from the fact that a few Senators are in control of all the important appropriations committees and of all the important legislative committees; that for many years it has come to be the practice here for the bills which they bring in to be presented in the closing hours of the session and to be put through under pressure, which does not admit of investigation and discussion; and that, as a first step toward coming to better results in legislation, debate and investigation upon these appropriation bills, however late they may come in in the session, will be wholesome for this body and good for the country.

I know I have taxed the patience of Senators, as I have my strength.

Mr. TILLMAN. I make the point of order against the amendment that it proposes general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is open to the same objection as was the amendment upon a similar subject reported by the committee, and which went out on a point of order yesterday. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I hope we may now soon dispose of the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the amendment regarding the Marine Corps. I have been quite in sympathy with the purpose of the committee in restoring the Marine Corps to the battle ships and armored cruisers, and it was perhaps necessary to put the amendment in the form in which it was presented in order to make it germane to the bill. But the amendment has now been added to the bill; that danger point has been passed; and it strikes me it can be now so amended as entirely to accomplish the purpose that is intended without putting the Senate in the undignified position of declaring that all the appropriations for the Marine Corps shall practically be dependent upon the action of the President of the United States.

Under the amendment as framed it is not declared as a part of the President's duty that he shall permit the officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps to serve as heretofore on board the battle ships and armored cruisers, but it is declared that in case he excludes them from the battle ships and armored cruisers the entire appropriation for the Marine Corps shall fail.

It is possible for us to so amend this amendment, which is now a part of the bill, as to make it the duty of the President to allow the officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps to serve upon these ships, and I think if our action takes that shape it will be much more dignified in form.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will suggst, if the Senator will just hear me through, that we strike out all of the amendment as adopted down to the word "officers," on line 9, and that we insert after the word "men," on the same line, the words "of the Marine Corps," so that it will read:

Officers and enlisted men of the Marine Corps shall serve as heretofore on board all battle ships and armored cruisers, and also upon such other vessels of the navy as the President may direct, in detachments of not less than 8 per cent of the strength of the enlisted men of the navy on said vessels.

I move that the words referred to in the first part of the proviso be stricken out and that the words "of the Marine Corps," after the word "men," on line 9, be inserted.

Mr. HALE. The amendment is not in order, of course, after the Senate has adopted the provision, and it can only be amended by reconsidering the vote; but to settle the whole matter, I move to lay the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HALE. There have been several requests for formal matters of morning business before going into executive session. I presume there may be an opportunity now, as we had no morning business this morning, for such Senators to present routine matters that they have in charge.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 1458), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith the report of the engineers appointed by me to accompany the ex-Secretary of War, the Hon. William H. Taft, to the Isthmian Canal to look into the condition of the canal work and especially to report upon the feasibility and safety of the Gatun dam project, with a view to deciding whether or not there should be any change in the plans in accordance with which the canal is being constructed, these plans having been adopted by the Congress. I am happy to report to you that the accompanying document shows in clearest fashion that the Congress was wise in the position it took and that it would be an inexcusable folly to change from the proposed lock canal to a sea-level canal. In fact, this report not only determines definitely the type of canal, but makes it evident that hereafter attack on this type—the lock type—is in reality merely attack upon the policy of building any canal at all. The board of engineers who signed this report are, of all the men in their profession, within or without the United States, the men who are, on the whole, best qualified to pass upon these very questions which they examined. I commend to you the most careful consideration of their report. They show that the only criticism that can be made of the work on the Isthmus is that there has sometimes been almost an excess of caution in providing against possible trouble. As to the Gatun dam itself, they show that not only is the dam safe, but that, on the whole, the plan already adopted would make it needlessly high and strong, and, accordingly, they recommend that the height be reduced by 20 feet, which change in the plans I have accordingly directed. Every American citizen should feel not merely gratification, but a very keen sense of pride in the statement made by this distinguished body of engineers as to the way in which the work has been done and in which it is now proceeding. The American people are to be heartily congratulated on everything of importance that has been done in connection with the building of the Panama Canal.

TERRITORY OF ARIZONA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Territory of Arizona, ss:

I, John H. Page, secretary of Arizona, do hereby certify that the within is a true and complete transcript of house memorial No. 4, which was filed in this office on the 11th day of February, 1909, at 11.35 a. m.

House memorial 4.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas in the year 1907 the Reclamation Service, on the part of the United States Government, entered into a certain contract with the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in Phoenix, Ariz., which said contract related to the sale of electric power to be generated in the future at the Roosevelt dam, in the Territory of Arizona, and which said contract sold to the said Pacific Gas and Electric Company all the electric power generated at said dam to be used in the city of Phoenix, Territory of Arizona, under the following terms, contained in Article II of said contract, to wit:

"ART. II. The party of the first part (the Government) further agrees while serving to the party of the second part (Pacific Gas and Electric Company) under the terms of this contract to refrain from entering into a general retailing of power to customers in the city of Phoenix, Ariz., or from furnishing power to anyone to be sold again or retailed; however, that the party of the first part shall have the right to sell or lease power in the city of Phoenix at any time in blocks of 100 to 500 kilowatts and over to anyone to be used for manufacturing industries, waterworks, or pumping plants;" and

Whereas said clause in said contract creates a monopoly and a trust in favor of said Pacific Gas and Electric Company in said city of Phoenix, relieving it from competition and allowing it to charge consumers in the city of Phoenix charges for electric power controlled and governed only by its desire and conscience: Therefore be it

Resolved by the twenty-fifth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, That we earnestly and respectfully petition and request the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to call upon the Secretary of the Interior to produce said contract and all correspondence and papers relating thereto, and to investigate said contract; and if, upon investigation, it appears that said contract is unjust, illegal, and creative of a monopoly, that proper proceedings be brought to obtain the abrogation and annulment of the same; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory be, and hereby is, directed to forward to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH, our Delegate in Congress, an engrossed copy of this memorial forthwith.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4024) for the relief of John H. Hamiter.

Mr. FULTON. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk may be inserted in the RECORD. Since the bill was passed, we have discovered through the Department of Justice that it is probably a claim that ought not to be allowed, and for that reason we wish to have it recalled.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 13, 1909.

Hon. CHARLES W. FULTON,
Chairman Committee on Claims,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I herewith transmit a report made by Mr. W. H. Lamar, an attorney in this department, to Assistant Attorney-General John Q. Thompson.

Owing to the large number of so-called "cotton claims" and the vast amounts therein involved, I deem it essential that you should have information as to the particular claim of the administrator of John Hamiter referred to in the report.

I beg leave to further call your attention to S. 4042, which is a bill for the relief of the same parties mentioned in the inclosed report. It seems that provision is made in both bills for this particular claim.

Very respectfully,

CHARLES W. RUSSELL,
Acting Attorney-General.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, February 11, 1909.

Hon. JOHN Q. THOMPSON,
Assistant Attorney-General.

SIR: Some months ago you assigned me to the work of preparing defenses in the Court of Claims in cotton cases referred under the Tucker Act. I notice on page 203 of House bill No. 15372, as amended and passed by the Senate on February 1, 1909, the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Allen H. Hamiter, administrator of the estate of John H. Hamiter, deceased, of Lafayette County, Ark., the sum of $3,590.47, the proceeds of the sale of 53 bales of cotton sold by the Government in 1865 and placed in the Treasury of the United States."

This original claim was rejected by the Treasury Department on account of the failure of the claimant to prove ownership and has never been passed upon by the Court of Claims.

John H. Hamiter, as administrator of John Hamiter, and in his own behalf, filed two claims in the Treasury Department for cotton alleged to have been taken by the federal forces in 1865, under the act of May 18, 1872, claiming in the aggregate for the proceeds of 190 bales of cotton. These claims were passed upon by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the proceeds of 90 bales of cotton in the seed taken from the Hamiter plantations in Arkansas, amounting in the aggregate to $1,310.50, was paid over to John H. Hamiter, for himself, as agent of R. E. Hamiter, Hattie Hamiter, and Catherine Hamiter, as provided for in said act of May 18, 1872. The claim for the remaining 90 bales was rejected by the Treasury for the following reasons:

"As to the remaining 90 bales for which claim is made, it has been decided upon the evidence that the claimants were not the lawful owners thereof at the time of the alleged seizure and that there is no evidence or reason to believe that any proceeds of the same reached the Treasury. The claim to said 90 bales is therefore rejected." (Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 1, 1875, to Messrs. Bartley & Jenner, attorneys for John H. Hamiter, et al., Washington, D. C., to be found among the papers in the case of John H. Hamiter v. United States, in the Court of Claims, No. 321, Cong.)

Subsequently the claims of John H. Hamiter, above mentioned, were referred to the Court of Claims for findings of fact under the Bowman Act and docketed as No. 321, Congressional, said claim being for 180 bales of cotton, valued at $36,000. The petition in this case was filed in the court on August 3, 1885. Testimony in support thereof was duly taken, but the case was dismissed for nonprosecution by the claimants on October 31, 1901. Prior to the dismissal of this case, however, the same claim was referred to the Court of Claims by resolution of the United States Senate in 1890, under the Tucker Act, and depositions in behalf of the claimant were also taken in that case. This latter case was docketed as No. 7256, Congressional. This case was also dismissed for nonprosecution on October 31, 1901.

The records in the above two cases in the Court of Claims, consisting of official documents and testimony in behalf of claimants, present a state of facts which I deem it my duty to call to your attention, in view of the item above quoted, contained in the omnibus claims bill which has been passed by the Senate and is now pending before the House of Representatives.

The official documents bearing upon this claim are as follows:

Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the First Auditor of the Treasury, dated June 11, 1874, as follows:

"Upon examination of the claim of John H. Hamiter, and as agent of R. E. Hamiter, Hattie Hamiter, and Catherine Hamiter, all of Lafayette County, Ark., for the proceeds of 180 bales of cotton under the provisions of the fifth section of the act of May 18, 1872, and the evidence submitted by the claimant in connection with the records and files of this department having been considered, it appears:

"That of the cotton claimed by said Hamiter, proceeds from 90 bales were paid into the Treasury, being the 90 bales described in claimant's petition as being in the seed at the close of the rebellion in 1865; that said John H. Hamiter, R. E. Hamiter, Hattie Hamiter, and Catherine Hamiter were the lawful owners of said 90 bales at the time of seizure; and that the same were seized after the 30th day of June, 1865, by agents of the Government unlawfully and in violation of their instructions. It is further found that the net proceeds, with interest, from said 90 bales of cotton actually paid into the Treasury was, as nearly as can be ascertained, the sum of $914.70.

"You are therefore authorized and instructed to state an account in favor of John H. Hamiter, and as agent as aforesaid, for the sum of $914.70, to be paid him as provided by said act in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for and on account of the 90 bales of cotton aforesaid.

"With respect to 90 bales of cotton, the residue of the 180 bales claimed and described in the petition, examination and decision has been deferred to allow the claimant an opportunity to produce further evidence."

Also the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the first auditor, dated December 1, 1875:

"In the matter of the claim of John H. Hamiter and others, of Lafayette County, Ark., for the proceeds of 180 bales of cotton under the provisions of the fifth section of the act of May 18, 1872, and upon examination of which claim and the evidence produced therein you were instructed by letter of June 11, 1874, to state an account in favor of the claimants for the sum of $914.70 as the net proceeds in the Treasury, as nearly as could be ascertained, of 90 bales, part of said 180 bales, upon further consideration of said claim and of the evidence, it has been found that in the computation of such net proceeds there was charged against said 90 bales the sum of $395.81 as expenses for river transportation, and as paid by O. H. Burbridge, supervising special agent; and upon further examination of the accounts of said Burbridge it has been ascertained that said sum as expenses of transportation was not paid by him nor by the United States.

"Now, therefore, you are hereby authorized and directed to state a new and further account in favor of said John H. Hamtier, in his own right and as agent of R. E. Hamiter, Hattie Hamiter, and Catherine Hamiter, for said sum of $395.81, to be paid to him and them in full satisfaction of all their claims against the United States for and on account of the cotton described in their petition.

Also, the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to Thomas P. McManus, esq., Washington, D. C., dated February 23, 1888:

"In answer to the petition of John H. Hamiter, filed by you January 16, 1888, as his attorney, asking that his claim for proceeds of 180 bales of cotton, alleged to have been seized in Lafayette County, Tex., in 1865, be reopened, and that the same be certified to the Court of Claims, it appears from the records of the department that this claim was filed under section 5 of the act of May 18, 1872, and that upon final adjudication by the Secretary of the Treasury the sum of $1,310.55 was allowed and paid thereon.

"In answer to the request that the claim be reopened, you are informed that under the law and the rules of the department the Secretary of the Treasury is not authorized to reopen and reexamine a claim which has been finally adjudicated and settled by a former Secretary unless it is made to appear by satisfactory evidence that a mistake arising from errors of calculation has occurred in a former settlement to the prejudice of the claimant, or unless some newly discovered material evidence has been presented.

"The evidence referred to in the petition does not show to the satisfaction of the department that any mistake occurred in the settlement of this claim; but, on the contrary, it appears that the claim was carefully examined, with full knowledge of the document referred to in the petition, and the whole amount due thereon as shown by the evidence was allowed and paid. Nor is any newly discovered evidence which may have a material bearing upon the merits of the claim been presented. The request to reopen this settlement is therefore denied."

* * * * * * *

Under date of January 7, 1893, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to the Court of Claims certified copy of an opinion prepared in his office showing in detail how the amounts paid to John H. Hamiter for the 90 bales of cotton in the seed had been determined by that department. Said paper concludes with the following paragraph:

"As to the remaining 90 bales for which claim is made a decision has been deferred to enable the claimant to produce further evidence, deemed necessary to support the claim, touching the nature of an admitted contract of the claimant for the sale of 175 bales to the Confederate States of America, and showing whether or not the 90 bales was a part of said 175 bales. Such additional evidence has not been produced, and the lapse of time (seventeen months) justifies the conclusion that it will not be.

"There is borne upon the confederate cotton lists 175 bales of cotton as having been sold by John H. Hamiter to the Confederate States of America. This doubtless was the same cotton to which the claimant refers in his petition as having been contracted to the Confederate States of America. The instructions of this department required them to seize this 175 bales, and it will be presumed, in the absence of countervailing proof, that the 90 bales was a part thereof seized in obedience to instructions. As to this 90 bales, therefore, I am of opinion that the claim should be rejected. * * *

"It is proper to add that there is much reason to doubt whether any proceeds of this last 90 bales reached the Treasury."

In case No. 7256, Congressional, John H. Hamiter filed in the Court of Claims on August 9, 1890, two petitions. In one of these he appears as administrator of the estate of his father, John Hamiter, and alleges, among other things, that said John Hamiter died on or about the 2d of February, 1864; that he was the owner of a plantation in Lafayette County, Ark.; and that there had been raised on said plantation a quantity of cotton, amounting to 150 bales, which remained thereon, unsold and undisposed of, until July, 1865, at which time the said cotton was seized by the Treasury agents of the United States, or upon their authority, on the alleged ground that it was confederate cotton, which he alleged was in no sense based upon facts, inasmuch as the said cotton had not been sold or contracted for with the confederate government, but remained in the possession of the heirs of said John Hamiter until said seizure; that said cotton was forwarded by the Treasury agents to New Orleans, and from this point shipped to Simon Draper, of New York, and by him sold on account of the Government and the proceeds turned into the Treasury; that no claim was made for the proceeds of said cotton under the captured and abandoned property act, for the reason that the legal representatives of said John Hamiter could not take the required oath of loyalty on the part of said John Hamiter, deceased.

In the second petition, of the same date and in the same case, John H. Hamiter appears in his own right and alleges that on the 1st day of July, 1865, he was the owner in his own right of 90 bales of cotton then being on his plantation in Lafayette County, Ark.; that in the month of July or August, 1865, the said cotton was taken possession of by E. B. Fuqua, an agent of the Treasury Department, and by him shipped to New York to Simon Draper, the selling agent for the Government, by whom the said cotton was sold, and the proceeds thereof turned into the Treasury; that he did not present his claim for said net proceeds under the captured and abandoned property act, because he could not conscientiously take the oath prescribed by the Court of Claims and required; that he afterwards filed a claim for said cotton under the act of May 18, 1872, and received on account thereof the two sums of $914.70 and $395.85, aggregating $1,310.55.

John H. Hamiter testified in his own behalf in case No. 329, Congressional, on the 18th day of September, 1885. He also testified in support of his claim in case No. 7256, Congressional, on March 30, 1892. In the first of these depositions he made, among others, the following statements:

"That he lived in 1865 in Lafayette County, Ark., and was a farmer; raised corn and cotton in 1864–65 and had thereon in the year 1865 90 bales of cotton on his own place and 90 bales of cotton on the adjoining farm of his father, the latter having died on the 2d day of February, 1864; that he bought the 90 bales on his father's farm from his two sisters and one brother, making 180 bales that he owned at the time; that the cotton was taken by a federal officer by the name of Furqua, who represented himself to be a United States Treasury agent; that he stayed at his house two or three days before he took the cotton. Witness was not at home when the cotton was taken, but was in Louisiana, 14 miles from home. Thinks the cotton was shipped to Camden, Ark., some to Washington, Ark., and some to Shreveport, La.; that he presented his claim to the Secretary of the Treasury for the recovery of the proceeds of the 180 bales in 1872, and was paid on account thereof the sum of $1,310.55; that in the year 1863 he bargained to sell to Col. L. B. Welburne, whom he knew to be a confederate purchasing agent, 175 bales of cotton; that 50 of these bales were part of the cotton covered by his pending claim; that the balance of the 175 bales contracted to be sold to the confederate government were, as a matter of fact, sold in the years 1863–64 to his father and other parties; that a few days after he had agreed to sell the 175 bales to the confederate agent the latter told him that he had no money to pay for it and canceled the contract, evidence of which transaction he claimed that he had had in certain papers which had been accidentally burned in 1868 or 1869; that at the time he agreed to sell the 175 bales of cotton to Colonel Welburne he marked them 'C. S.,' so that 50 of the bales seized by the United States Treasury Department bore that mark.

"On cross-examination witness said that he purchased the interest of the other heirs in his father's cotton in 1865, some months after the seizure of the cotton by the United States, and a claim was made for it to the Secretary of the Treasury, the object of the sale being to transfer the rights of the heirs to their shares of the cotton so he could include all the cotton in the one claim in his own name; that such transfer by the heirs to him was without valuable consideration; that at the time of the seizure there was on his place, at his residence, 30 bales of cotton bearing the initials 'J. H. H.' and 60 bales on his plantation, 2½ miles from his residence, bearing the initials 'J. H. H.,' and 90 bales on his father's place, marked 'H.;' that the cotton on his father's place was sometimes marked 'L. P.,' to designate on which plantation it was raised, meaning Long Prairie plantation; that the cotton marked 'C. S.' (50 bales) was at the time seized on the witness's own place; that only 10 bales of it were marked 'J. H. H.' and 50 bales marked 'C. S.;' there was no other cotton on either plantation marked 'C. S.;' 90 of the 180 bales were raised on John Hamiter's place, on the Long Prairie plantation, and the other 90 bales were raised on the witness's plantation, and they were of the crops of 1863 and 1864 to the best of his recollection; witness sold and shipped the cotton crops of 1860, 1861, and 1862, and thinks it possible that some of the crops of 1861 and 1862 was in the cotton seized; the cotton was seized about August, 1865."

John H. Hamiter, in his testimony in support of his claim for this cotton under the Tucker Act (case No. 7256, Cong.), given on March 30, 1892, stated, among other things, as follows:

"That his father owned two plantations, one on Long Prairie, Lafayette County, Ark., and the other in Bosier Parish, La., and raised cotton and corn thereon; that he, the witness, sold 70 bales of the cotton claimed, and which was raised on his father's Arkansas plantation, to Mrs. Eliza Trigg, which cotton he delivered at Gum Springs, in Bosier Parish, La., her place of residence, she paying for the cotton on delivery; that about two weeks later it was seized by the United States authorities; that afterwards Mrs. Trigg had witness arrested and he and Mrs. Trigg rescinded the trade, the witness alleging that he gave Mrs. Trigg notes, with security, for the purchase price of the cotton that he had sold to her and for which he had received payment from her in cash; the witness heard that General Hovey seized this cotton, and Mrs. Trigg had witness arrested; that these 70 bales of cotton sold to Mrs. Trigg were not part of any cotton sold to the confederate government; that it was the private property of the heirs of John Hamiter, his father; that at the time the cotton was seized it was at Carolina Bluffs, La., he thinks; that he was living in Arkansas and the cotton was in Louisiana at the time seized; that the two plantations of his father before the war yielded 700 or 800 bales per annum, but that from the date of his father's death, in February, 1864, to August, 1865, he thinks there were about 200 bales raised on said plantations; that the sale of the 70 bales was made to Mrs. Trigg in July or August, 1865; that they were sold to her at his house, at Walnut Hill, and he delivered them to her in person; that he does not know of his personal knowledge what became of the cotton he sold Mrs. Trigg; did not see it taken and never saw it after he delivered it to Mrs. Trigg; the witness does not know of his own personal knowledge what became of the other cotton embraced in his claim; that he is acting as the representative of the heirs of John Hamiter in the pending suit."

In the case of Mary Eliza Pillow, No. 7151 in the Court of Claims, the petition was filed on March 15, 1873. Among other things, the petition alleges that the claimant purchased 75 bales of cotton in September or October, 1865, from John Hamiter, in Lafayette County, Ark., and shortly after the purchase she took possession and hauled it from Hamiter's plantation to a point on Red River below the raft for shipment, the distance being 50 miles; that while these 75 bales were lying on the banks of the river awaiting shipment the same were taken possession of, against her remonstrance, by C. Tewell, claiming to be a government agent, and shipped, as she understands, to New Orleans and there shipped or sold and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The testimony in this case, taken in 1873, develops the fact that these 75 bales of cotton were purchased from Hamiter and taken from the Hamiter plantation in Arkansas to a point on Red River opposite Shreveport, La., where it was seized by the federal authorities.

There is also a report from the Treasury Department in the Pillow case, dated June 12, 1874, furnishing a certified copy of the following paper sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the attorney for John H. Hamiter:

WASHINGTON, D. C.

In view of the fact that there seems to be conflicting claims for the 70 bales of cotton sold by John H. Hamiter to Trigg & King, Bosier Parish, La., or to Mrs. M. E. Trigg (now wife of G. J. Pillow), as mentioned in the foregoing affidavit, I, as attorney for John H. Hamiter, do hereby relinquish all claim to the Trigg cotton aforesaid as being a portion of the cotton claimed by J. H. Hamiter in his claim for 180 bales filed before the Secretary of the Treasury under act of May 18, 1872.

T. A. FLANAGAN, Attorney.

JUNE 1, 1874.

There is also among the papers in the case of John H. Hamiter (No. 7256 Cong.) a copy of the following paper, forwarded to the court from the Secretary of the Treasury on May 13, 1892:

SHREVEPORT, LA., October 3, 1865.

Of the cotton I shipped to-day on steamer Amaranth, 70 bales are in dispute. The papers will be handed you by parties in interest, unless they prefer to forward them through me. The cotton was once sold to the Confederate States government and a bill of sale executed, but the parties claim want of consideration. They say they did not get the bonds or money, but they did make sale of the cotton to the Confederate States. Can anyone annul a contract which it takes two parties to make?

Respectfully,

C. E. HOVEY,
Special Agent, Treasury Department.

Hon. O. N. CUTTER,
Special Agent, Treasury Department.

The suit of Mrs. Trigg (afterwards Mrs. Pillow) in the Court of Claims (No. 7151), involving the Hamiter cotton, was filed as a general jurisdiction case under the captured and abandoned property act. After testimony had been taken, however, it was dismissed, on motion of the Government, for want of jurisdiction, the petition not having been filed within the two years' limitation prescribed by the act.

It will be observed from the foregoing papers that, while Mrs. Pillow claimed to have purchased 75 bales of this cotton from Hamiter, Hamiter himself testifies that only 70 bales were so sold. There can be no doubt, however, of the fact that the same cotton is referred to in the suits by both of these parties. That J. H. Hamiter is correct as to the number of bales sold to Mrs. Pillow appears from the records of the Treasury Department, as shown in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 1, 1875 (Senate Ex. Doc. 123, 43d Cong., 2d sess., top p. 36), which shows the seizure from J. H. Hamiter, Lafayette County, Ark., by E. B. Fuqua of 70 bales of cotton, 17 of which went to the contractor for his services and 53 bales of which were sent to New York, the net proceeds of which, $3,590.47, were turned into the Treasury. This description corresponds in number of bales and net proceeds with that embodied in the paragraph of the omnibus bill, above quoted, and probably furnishes the basis for the action taken in the matter by the Senate.

There can be no question of the fact that these original 70 bales of cotton, the net proceeds of 53 bales of which, amounting to $3,590.47, went into the Treasury, were raised on the John Hamiter place in Arkansas. As has been shown, the ownership of this cotton and its legal status at the time it was seized have never been adjudicated by any tribunal other than the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the Secretary of the Treasury decided this question of ownership adversely to John H. Hamiter in an ex parte proceeding, the claim of Mrs. Pillow for the same cotton not having been before that department at the time the claim was first rejected. John H. Hamiter himself admits in his testimony given at one time that cotton from the Hamiter place had been sold to the confederate government and 50 bales, at least, of it marked "C. S." at the time of the taking.

The report of Special Agent Hovey of October 3, 1865, above quoted, which it would seem, beyond question, relates to this identical cotton, states that all of this cotton was once sold to the Confederate States government and a bill of sale executed for it to that government. His report also shows that at the time of seizure it was in dispute. This "dispute" evidently refers to the conflicting claims of Hamiter and Mrs. Pillow as to the ownership of the lot. So far as the public records and the testimony taken in the various cases bearing upon this cotton are concerned, it has never been determined whether this cotton covered by the item in the omnibus bill was the property of the confederate government at the time it was seized or whether the John Hamiter estate of John H. Hamiter or Mrs. Pillow had the legal title thereto. It does not appear that Mrs. Pillow or her representatives have attempted to have this question adjudicated since her original suit under the general jurisdiction of the court was dismissed, but there is no apparent reason why she or her heirs could not raise the question under a Tucker Act reference of her claim. If John H. Hamiter or his attorneys had been sure of his ownership in this cotton, it is not understood why he should have permitted the suit for the proceeds of this cotton under the Tucker Act to fail for want of prosecution after having taken testimony in support of his claim.

Quite a number of these old cotton claims have been referred to the court under the Tucker Act within the last few years. The claims so referred amount to millions of dollars, and, as stated, have been placed in my hands to defend. I have been engaged for some time in classifying available data and arranging authorities in the preparation of a general line of defense to these suits. The contemplated action of Congress in making an appropriation in one of such cases, in the absence of any adjudication by the court and in the face of the adverse decision of the Treasury Department on the original claim, might set a precedent which would seriously affect the line of defense contemplated in this class of cases.

Very respectfully,

W. H. LAMAR,
Assistant Attorney.

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. CULLOM. I submit a resolution, which I hope may be acted upon at once.

The resolution (S. Res. 291) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after the 4th day of March, 1909, the jurisdiction and functions of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, hitherto exercised in connection with the Senate wing of the Capitol, be, and the same are hereby, extended to cover in like manner jurisdiction over the Senate Office Building; and on and after the 4th day of March, 1909, said committee is hereby authorized and directed to proceed with the assignment of rooms in the Senate Office Building for the use of Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. Let it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM subsequently said: The Senator from Maine, I think, will withdraw his opposition to the resolution. It ought to be adopted at once, as the Committee on Rules, I understand, desire it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois—I have no doubt he has considered it—that it might be desirable to attach this jurisdiction before the 4th of March, because I understand that the building will probably be ready for occupancy by the 20th.

Mr. CULLOM. That is a mistake, I think.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think not before the 4th.

Mr. BAILEY. I was told that the superintendent in charge of the work had already issued an order that the work was to cease on the 20th and was not to be resumed until September.

Mr. CULLOM. The resolution is acceptable to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to ask a question. Is there any purpose of turning that building over to people during the inauguration?

Mr. CULLOM. I hope not.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been suggested.

Mr. BAILEY. If there is such a purpose, I want to resist it.

Mr. CULLOM. It never has been suggested to the committee in charge of the building. The Committee on Rules may know about it; I do not.

Mr. BAILEY. Under the resolution we would not have jurisdiction until after the 4th.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee which has been in charge of the building so far do not expect to turn it over to anybody except to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NELSON. I should be glad to have the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. It should read "for the use of committees and Senators."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether any plan for the distribution of those rooms has been agreed upon?

Mr. CULLOM. None; except that it is left to the Committee on Rules entirely, as far as we are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The point I desire to make is this——

Mr. CULLOM. The committee in charge of the building so far simply regard themselves as through with the work, and it is the purpose of the committee to leave it to the Committee on Rules to do whatever they deem wise.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand it, the Committee on Rules have jurisdiction over the question of the assignment of rooms in the Capitol.

Mr. LODGE. And the Maltby Building.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the Maltby Building. The resolution extends their jurisdiction to the new Office Building, and if it is adopted the assignment of rooms there will be left entirely to the Committee on Rules without resubmitting the question to the Senate for ratification or final action. Is that the understanding?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. The purpose of it is that, exactly.

Mr. ALDRICH. That has always been the case.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have that jurisdiction over the committee rooms of this building, and the commission of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman, of which I chance to be a member, simply desire to extend the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules over the Office Building.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply wish to observe that when the House of Representatives took possession of their new building, the plan was agreed upon and there was a unanimous understanding about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. They draw lots there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They drew the rooms by lots.

Mr. BAILEY. They draw their seats by lots. We do not do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. We never have done that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not wish to urge that course. In fact, I think I am quite well satisfied to allow the Committee on Rules to exercise this very unenviable task, and yet I wish that there might have been some method suggested which would relieve Senators from the necessity of making appeals to a committee for proper space in that building. For my own part, I would have been very glad, indeed, if some provision could have been made for the assignment of rooms with reference to the seniority of membership here.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the rule followed by the Committee on Rules, invariably.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is that the invariable rule?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the invariable rule of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is the rule, and we may hope for that kind of a solution, I have nothing more to say about it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see no reason for a change of the rule in that respect.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to make one suggestion in this connection. Over at the annex some of the best rooms in the building are now occupied by clerks employed by large committees and by Senators. I suppose that building will be given up and the clerical force used by certain committees will be transferred to rooms in the new building.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably.

Mr. STONE. I do not think that the best suites of rooms should be taken by senior Senators merely for the use of their clerks, provided they are going to occupy their committee rooms here in the Capitol.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree fully with the Senator from Missouri on that point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING OF HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit an order and ask for its adoption.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed as a Senate document the secret proceedings and debates of the Federal Convention assembled for the purpose of framing the Constitution of the United States, including the "genuine information" laid before the legislature of Maryland by Luther Martin, a member of said convention, and also other historical documents relative to the federal compact of the North American Union.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to ask what the order covers. Does it cover all the proceeding?

Mr. BAILEY. It covers the proceedings and documents in this book [exhibiting], printed in 1821, not copyrighted; and although I have frequently in my time heard of it, I was never able to obtain a copy of it until recently, when I obtained it through the kindness of ex-Senator Faulkner. I find it to be a most interesting volume.

Mr. LODGE. I know the book.

Mr. BAILEY. I find that it has not been printed along with the documentary history of the Constitution.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator know whether it is included in the documentary history of the Constitution now being printed by the State Department?

Mr. BAILEY. No; it has not been included. I have made inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. Then I hope it will be reprinted. It is a very valuable book.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the Senator if it includes the Yates notes?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; it includes the Yates notes, and it includes the celebrated address which Luther Martin delivered before the legislature of Maryland.

Mr. MONEY. "Genuine information?"

Mr. BAILEY. "Genuine information."

The order was agreed to.

ANGELINE C. BURGERT.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 25064) for the relief of Angeline C. Burgert, to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the bill.

Mr. STONE. That is a very short bill. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Angeline C. Burgert $157.72, the amount of her distributive share of the net proceeds of the sale of the Painesville and Youngstown Railroad, applicable to bond No. 209, issued by the Painesville and Youngstown Railroad Company and owned by her, out of the sum of $473.22 deposited in the United States Treasury on December 1, 1898, by Irving Belford, clerk of the United States circuit court, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States with the National Bank of Commerce, of Cleveland, Ohio, on account of unclaimed funds, as per certificate of deposit No. 201, which said deposit was covered into the United States Treasury, by a miscellaneous receipt, by warrant No. 2274, second quarter of the year 1899.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LADING AND UNLADING OF VESSELS.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill (S. 5694) to provide for the lading or unlading of vessels at night, to facilitate the entry of vessels, and for other purposes, be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR FLORIDA.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 129) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to the State of Florida, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 1011) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID H. DICKINSON.

Mr. DEPEW. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 27342) to amend the military record of David H. Dickinson. It is a short bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that David H. Dickinson, late a private of Company G, Twenty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from said company and regiment on August 9, 1865. But no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act. From any pension he may hereafter show himself entitled to there shall be no deduction or rebate on account of former alleged erroneous payments of pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, DULUTH, MINN.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 9182) to increase the limit of cost for the acquisition of additional land for the site of the new post-office and court-house at Duluth, Minn.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5 of the act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 30, 1908, so as to increase the limit of cost for the acquisition of additional land for the site of the new post-office and court-house at Duluth, Minn., from $95,000 to $175,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS OF KAW AND OSAGE INDIANS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8554) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell part or all of the surplus lands of members of the Kaw or Kansas tribe of Indians in Oklahoma.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments on page 1, line 6, after the word "Kansas," to strike out "tribe" and insert "and Osage tribes;" and in line 7, after the word "Oklahoma," to insert: "Provided, That the sales of the Osage lands shall be subject to the reserved rights of the tribe in oil, gas, and other minerals," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, upon application, to sell, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, part or all of the surplus lands of any member of the Kaw or Kansas and Osage tribes of Indians in Oklahoma: Provided, That the sales of the Osage lands shall be subject to the reserved rights of the tribe in oil, gas, and other minerals.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell part or all of the surplus lands of members of the Kaw or Kansas and Osage tribes of Indians in Oklahoma, and for other purposes."

JOSEPH SWISHER.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9617) for the relief of Joseph Swisher, reported a few moments ago from the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph Swisher $109.87, being the amount withheld for tools lost in battle in the settlement of his account as captain in the One hundred and thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry and quartermaster of the Second Brigade, Second Division, Fourteenth Army Corps.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6903) for the relief of Willis A. Joy.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Willis A. Joy $108, to reimburse him for money paid by him, at the direction of the Post-Office Department, while postmaster at Grand Forks, N. Dak., for redemption of certain post-office keys, and for which redemption no funds were ever provided him nor reimbursement made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to yield to me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Masssachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Montana; but after that I shall insist on my motion.

FEARON, DANIEL & CO.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 83) for the relief of the firm of Fearon, Daniel & Co., of New York and Shanghai.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 3, line 21, after the words "out of the," it is proposed to strike out "said Chinese Boxer indemnity fund," and insert "sum of $2,000,000 reserved in and by the joint resolution providing for the remission of a portion of the Chinese indemnity, approved May 25, 1908," so as to make the section read:

That the firm of Fearon, Daniel & Co., of New York and Shanghai, shall be regarded and treated as an American firm in respect of the so-called "Boxer indemnity fund," and that there shall be paid to the said firm out of the said funds the amount held by the United States commissioners at Peking "to constitute a valid claim for indemnification" for the losses and damages suffered by the said firm by reason of the so-called "Boxer uprising," to wit, $10,544.64, less $1,977.44, heretofore awarded and paid to Mr. J. R. Patterson, a partner in the said firm, and a citizen of the United States, for his share of three-sixteenths in the said firm, leaving $8,567.17 to be paid to the said firm, together with interest at the same rate and from the same date as heretofore allowed and paid by the Department of State on the other awards or allowances of the said commissioners, such payment to be made by the said firm out of the sum of $2,000,000 reserved in and by the joint resolution providing for the remission of a portion of the Chinese indemnity, approved May 25, 1908, on proof satisfactory to the Secretary of State that Mr. James S. Fearon, senior partner of said firm, has been duly naturalized as a citizen of the United States, and that no claim has been paid or allowed for the said losses and damages of the said firm in whole or part through the British Government or otherwise than hereinbefore stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the preamble to the joint resolution be disagreed to.

The preamble was rejected.

C. F. SUGG.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee, and then I shall insist on my motion.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16551) to pay to C. F. Sugg, of Hales Point, Lauderdale County, Tenn., $79.95, for damages inflicted upon gasoline steamer Clyde by light-house tender Oleander.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21492 and that the same be considered in the House at this time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to sell, upon sealed bids or at public auction, at his discretion, for cash, any or all of the vacant public lands in township 8 north, range 30 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, which are embraced within the fractional subdivisions which resulted from disconnected surveys; and the expenses of such sale, including the cost of publication of such notices as said Secretary may direct, shall be paid out of the proceeds thereof.

SEC. 2. That a sum of money, equal to the net proceeds of the sales authorized by this act, shall be pro rated among and severally paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the persons or the heirs of the persons who acquired title from the United States to lands in sections 6, 7, 18, 19, 30, and 31, in township 8 north, range 29 west of the sixth principal meridian, in the State of Nebraska, in proportion to the loss in area severally sustained by such persons by reason of such disconnected surveys.

With the following committee amendments:

In section 2, page 1, in line 12, strike out the words "a sum of money equal to."

At the end of line 13, in said section, said page, add the words "by the Secretary of the Interior."

In lines 14 and 15 of said section and page strike out the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

On page 2, in line 1 of said section, strike out the words "acquired title from the United States to" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "On February 13, 1908, were the owners of the."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this accomplishes. The report does not show.

Mr. NORRIS. I can explain to the gentleman quicker by this plat that I hold in my hand. This comes about on account of a resurvey of one township, by virtue of an act passed in 1902. The settlers who took land in sections 6, 7, 18, 19, and 31 supposed, and the government officials supposed, that the range line between 30 and 29 extended over to what I have marked on the plat in red. The patents called for an amount of land that would go over to that red line on the plat, with the exception of about 50 acres.

Now, when the resurvey was made it was found that the line which is blue on the plat was the real range line. These men in these sections I have named were short 459 and a fraction acres. There was in the hiatus left on the other side of the blue line in range 30, 409 and a fraction acres of public land. That, as a matter of fact, was in excess of what the patents for the land of the settlers on the west side of the range line called for.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that in range 30 there is an excess?

Mr. NORRIS. In range 30, according to the resurvey, there is an excess. Of course the lines are not straight, as appear on this map; as the survey makes them it is an irregular line, and the proposition is to sell the parcels of land amounting to 409 acres and divide it up among the men who lost 459 acres on account of the survey in proportion to the amount they lost.

Mr. MANN. Is there a surplus or a shortage in range 29 in that township?

Mr. NORRIS. There is a shortage.

Mr. MANN. Under the resurvey?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So they actually lose a portion of the acreage that they are entitled to?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; if this bill passes they will still be short 50 acres.

Mr. MANN. The land between the red and blue lines is not surplus land, but it is simply a change of the range line.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there is a surplus in range 30 amounting practically to 409 acres of land that belongs to the Government.

Mr. MANN. Is this the west line of range 29?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is the east line of range 29 changed?

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir; there is no shortage anywhere east of these sections.

Mr. HINSHAW. Do the adjoining proprietors expect to pay for this public land?

Mr. NORRIS. The bill provides for the actual sale of the lands, and those who buy them will of course have to pay for them.

Mr. MANN. And it is expected that one side or the other will buy the land?

Mr. NORRIS. Not necessarily. Some of those who have lost land do not join any part of the hiatus that is to be sold.

In the resurvey men on the east side of section 6, for instance, have lost land, but they do not join the land that is really the surplusage, and in other places under the resurvey it is so irregular that the surplusage does not join anybody who has lost land on account of the resurvey.

Mr. MANN. The loss does not fall on the people owning the land on the east?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the loss is proportioned among all the men in this row of sections; there are some on the east side of the section a mile from the range line.

Mr. MANN. It is proposed to pay them this money less the expenses?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; less the expense of the sale. That is, the net proceeds of such sale.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NORRIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the House of Representatives a duplicate engrossed copy of the bill (S. 8273) to amend an act approved May 30, 1908, entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all the surplus lands after allotment," in compliance with its request, the original having been lost.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17214. An act for the relief of Harry Kimmell, a commander on the retired list of the United States Navy.

H. R. 27311. An act amending chapter 591 of the United States Statutes at Large, Fifty-sixth Congress, approved May 26, 1900, entitled "An act to provide for the holding of a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Superior, Wis."

MAKING RANIER, MINN., A SUBPORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 27478) constituting Ranier, Minn., a subport of entry, which, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 2177), was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

MOORES CREEK BATTLE GROUND ASSOCIATION.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8708) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate two condemned cannon to Moores Creek Battle Ground Association, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to Moores Creek Battle Ground Association, of Currie, N. C., two condemned bronze fieldpieces, with their carriages, and a suitable outfit of cannon balls which may not be needed in the service: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States in connection with the donation of the above-mentioned articles of ordnance property.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to state that the Committee on Military Affairs will to-morrow report an omnibus bill carrying all of these propositions for the donation of condemned cannon.

Mr. HAY. I would like to state to the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Speaker, that the committee decided that it would report bills coming from the Senate, because they would become law.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Is this a Senate bill?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CORRY, PA.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 24327) to make Corry, Pa., a port of delivery in the district of Erie, Pa., and extending to it the privileges of section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Corry, Pa., be, and the same is hereby, made and constituted a port of delivery in the district of Erie, Pa., and that the privileges of section 7 of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and the same are hereby, extended thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two about this bill. It seems to be creating a subport. About what will be the revenues received there each year, in the judgment of the gentleman?

Mr. BATES. That is impossible to state. It is in the district of Erie. This is for the especial purpose of receiving foreign hides in box for the tanning industries, which are carried on extensively in the city of Corry.

Mr. MACON. How far will it be located from a regular port of entry?

Mr. BATES. About 25 miles. I will say further to the gentleman from Arkansas that, under regulations of the Treasury Department, the deputy collector's compensation has to be met by those who avail themselves of his services, so that there will be no expense to the Government.

Mr. MACON. I will say to the gentleman that my reason for asking these questions and for objecting, if I should conclude to object at all, is that, as the gentleman knows, we have several ports where there are no receipts whatever, and yet good salaries are paid for collection.

Mr. BATES. Yes; this, however, will have very large revenues.

Mr. MACON. And yet at some of these ports where no revenues are received we pay a salary of $1,400 a year to the collector that collects nothing.

Mr. BATES. That is true, but the opposite would be true here. There would be considerable revenues to the Government, and no expense whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BATES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, a number of Members of the House have been asking me recently at what time the extra session of the next Congress would be called, and I desire to state that I am authorized by the President-elect to announce that it will be called for Monday, March 15, 1909. [Applause.]

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 23464), and ask unanimous consent that the statements be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a conference report and asks that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. Is this the conference report that proposes to increase so many salaries?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; but the gentleman will understand that the House will have full opportunity for discussion on everything that pertains to the salaries of the President, the Vice-President, the Speaker, and the judges of the United States courts, and, in detail, under each paragraph. There will be full opportunity for discussion and vote.

Mr. MACON. But will not the House be better advised as to what is in the report if it is read instead of the statement?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, the report has been published since February 10, and it is a published document. It has been printed under the rules of the House. The gentleman will have every opportunity for a discussion of everything.

Mr. MACON. But the gentleman will understand that a great many Members of Congress do not have time to go over all the reports that are printed, but that they might hear them read here from the Clerk's desk if they were given an opportunity.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the gentleman that the statement of the managers on the part of the House is far more easily understood than the report of the conference committee, which deals very largely with figures.

Mr. MACON. With that explanation, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. HENRY H. BINGHAM,
F. H. GILLETT,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report, and in moving that I desire to make this statement to the House, and I trust there will be just a little quiet, so that it may be thoroughly understood and we can be more expeditious in our work: In asking the unanimous consent of the House, which the House granted, for the conference report I made this statement, "excepting the amendments increasing the compensation of the Speaker, the President and Vice-President, and judges of the Supreme Court, and other judges of the United States, the additions to the public service proposed by the amendments of the Senate are not unique or extraordinary, and there is no doubt but that a conference committee can reconcile such differences. If this request is agreed to by the House, I am prepared to give assurances that no final agreement will be reached on the amendments just indicated without affording the House an opportunity of a separate vote on each one of the four subjects." We are prepared to carry out that statement of the House, as the House gave unanimous consent. In asking, therefore, the approval of the conference report I submit to the House that whatever have been the disagreements between the two Houses, they have been satisfactorily adjusted, with the exception of amendment No. 43, "and including purchase, driving, and care of carriage and horses for Vice-President." That is in disagreement; all the other items are in disagreement that have been indicated to the House. A full vote in any form that the House may determine upon will be the right of the House. There have been but two propositions that would seem to the House to be radical. The Senate for the first time in the history of legislation have covered their entire subordinate force with fixed definite work and fixed definite compensation, running to a certain extent under the well-established rules of the House. The courtesy that has heretofore existed between the government of the two Houses has been conceded in this proposed legislation, and I can say that so far as the miscellaneous or contingent fund of the Senate is concerned it is radically and almost wholly covered by the detailed legislation submitted to the House in the conference report.

The other item entirely new is the concession made in the proposed amount to the Secretary of State. The matter of the Secretary of State has been very thoroughly discussed by the House, as well as the publication in the report in full of the proposed legislation. That is conceded in the increases asked for by the Secretary of State, as well as by his predecessor, and I can simply say that the House conferees conceded that, and are of the belief that the concession is very reasonable, running to a sum total of $19,500, giving to the new Secretary of State virtually a bureau wholly his own. I think the report can be passed by the House, and we then enter immediately upon the differences submitted to the House in those paragraphs disagreed to by the House. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe the gentleman has an hour——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to the gentleman. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Say ten minutes; probably I would not use ten minutes. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Have I not an hour in my own right?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has yielded the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, I have not yielded the floor; I yielded the gentleman ten minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then I will take the ten minutes. I may not really want ten minutes. Mr. Speaker, the other day the House showed its extreme anxiety to secure for the Secretaryship of State a certain man, and it was so anxious to do that that it went through the preposterous performance of reducing the salary from $12,000 to $8,000 a year. I have no disposition here or elsewhere to dispute the right of the President of the United States to have anybody in his Cabinet he wants if he is qualified. The truth of it is I have always had a rather peculiar feeling about Cabinet appointments anyway. When we had a Democratic President and I was a Member of Congress I refused to recommend anybody to the President for a Cabinet office. If we had one or our man was coming in now, I would refuse to recommend anybody to him for a place in the Cabinet. I feel absolutely free to recommend anybody for other offices in the gift of the President except Cabinet places. It is a family relation in a certain sense, and I would as lief recommend one of my friends to marry a certain woman as to recommend the President to take any particular man into his Cabinet.

It so happens that I have no acquaintance with Senator KNOX; never spoke to him; but common fame says he is a very able man. But here is where we are now. In order to get him in the other day, on one hand, we took away $4,000 salary from him——

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. What we actually did was to take all salary from him, because the act repealing the increase did not revive the old salary allowed, and so he has not any salary if the act passed by the House the other day becomes law. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. So much the worse; so much stronger for my position, as I understand it. We were so anxious to have him in the Cabinet we took away $4,000 of his salary. Now, the gentleman from Kentucky suggests that as a matter of fact, in the bill which the House passed in that great feat of overriding the Constitution by legislative enactment, we inadvertently took away from him all his salary. [Laughter.]

The thing I wanted to call to the attention of the House is this: We, as a further inducement to secure the services of this illustrious statesman, at his suggestion, as I understand it—if I am incorrect about that I would like to be corrected, because I would not do any man an injustice knowingly—at his own suggestion, as I understand it, the first thing we do is to create the office of Undersecretary of State, "to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, who shall perform such duties as the Secretary of State may designate and as may be provided for by law, at a salary of $10,000 a year." That is inducement No. 2. We reduced his salary as inducement No. 1, and now create the office of Undersecretary, at a salary of $10,000, as inducement No. 2.

As inducement No. 3 we create a Fourth Assistant Secretary of State, "to be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, who shall perform such duties as the Secretary of State shall designate and as may be provided by law, $4,500" per annum. As the fourth inducement we create the office of "private secretary and clerk to the Secretary of State, to be appointed by the Secretary of State; private secretary to the Undersecretary of State, $2,500; clerk to the Undersecretary of State, $1,500, to be appointed by the Secretary of State."

As the fifth inducement we create the office of "private messenger to the Secretary of State, $1,000."

So that in order to secure the services of Senator KNOX as Secretary of State we create offices and increase salaries to a total amount of $19,500 a year.

If Senator KNOX were the only man in the United States fit to be Secretary of State, that might not be paying too high a price for the whistle. But I violate no confidence in this House when I say that there are 5,000 men in the United States who are qualified to make suitable Secretaries of State in ordinary times, and that within the range of my vision right now, leaving out every Democrat that I can see, I can pick out a dozen Republicans on the other side of the aisle that would make just as good Secretaries of State as we have had since I have been in Congress and paying attention to such things.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is nothing personal in this, General. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. I did not hear what the gentleman said, but I thank him, whatever he may have said. I think he was reading from page 45 of the bill, and I think he omitted to read the first line under the head "Department of State." I will read it. It is highly important.

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $12,000.

That, I understand, there is no dispute about at all, and it is not even in conference. Both Houses of Congress have already agreed to this as the salary of the Secretary of State. Will we not pay $12,000 in the fiscal year provided for in this bill? Will this not work another disqualification of Senator KNOX? I suggest that we will all vote to raise the salary to that amount before the 1st day of July next.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will not. You need not be counting all of us in. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the gentleman called my attention to that. It undoubtedly attaches to Senator KNOX again the ineligibility to serve in that Cabinet from July 1, 1909, until the 4th day of March, 1911. If that clause that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] called attention to is put in this bill, if it finally becomes a law, then I undertake to say that the ineligibility that attached to Senator KNOX before we passed that bill the other day, and which I think attaches to him yet, will reattach to him.

I want to call your attention to another fact. Everybody knows, who knows anything about our affairs at all, that there is a deficiency in the revenue of about $13,000,000 a month. And there is another fact that everybody who has any sense knows, that until this tariff bill is disposed of that deficiency in the revenue is going to increase month by month; and if the tariff debate drags along until the 1st of September, as it is likely to do, the deficiency in the revenues will mount up to $25,000,000 a month. With that condition of affairs staring us in the face, we are asked to increase the expenses of the office of Secretary of State $19,500 a year, and I should like somebody to give some good reason why that should be done. We are at peace with all the world. There are no complications in the office of Secretary of State except with two countries. One of them amounts to very little, and the other is in process of being settled amicably; and it is strange that in a time of profound peace, with nothing increasing the business and work of the office of the Secretary of State, we are to appropriate an extra $19,500 a year in order to secure the services of one man. I will not vote for it, and it does not seem to me that any man on the floor of the House ought to vote for it. And the House conferees were so anxious to get this thing done that they agreed to put into each one of these amendments which I have read the words "to be immediately available." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was considered by the conferees, the salary of the Secretary of State was $12,000 a year. Consequently we made the necessary appropriation for the salary as it then stood upon the statute books. There had been no suggestion then of changing the salary. Since then that salary has been changed. Whether that change is a law or not, having been signed by the President, I do not know, but undoubtedly it will become a law within a day or two. Therefore it is obviously necessary, it seems to me, that this appropriation bill should be changed to conform to the law which the House has passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether or not this $12,000 is a subject for the action of the conferees at all? Was it not agreed upon by both Houses?

Mr. GILLETT. It was so agreed upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the conferees have nothing to do with it.

Mr. GILLETT. No. It can only go back to the Senate and be changed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It can not be stricken out by the conferees.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly not; but the bill can go back to the Senate and let them change it.

Mr. BINGHAM. To submit the history of this matter in detail for the information of the House, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was reported to the House December 10, 1908. It passed the House December 11, 1908. It was reported to the Senate January 14, 1909, and passed the Senate January 22, 1909.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the facts have changed since this conference report was agreed to, I move that the House disagree to the conference report, and that the bill be sent back to conference.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is agreeable, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will yield for a question.

Mr. GILLETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that this report be disagreed to and the bill sent back to conference.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not ask that it be sent back to conference. I asked that it be disagreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The effect will be to send it back to conference, in order to remedy the anomalous condition that now exists by increasing in this bill the salary of the Secretary of State.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That will have to be done by the Senate and House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that. As one of those who voted to reduce the salary of the Secretary of State in order to make Senator KNOX eligible for the office, I am heartily in accord with the gentleman's position. But there is another situation disclosed here. I was perfectly willing that the President-elect should have perfect freedom in the selection of a Secretary of State. The statement made by the President-elect that this one man was so peculiarly qualified for the office that it would be a public misfortune if he could not obtain his services appealed very strongly to me. I was not aware, however, that this peculiarly well-qualified man would be unable to discharge the duties of this great office unless he was given assistance that neither the great Secretary John Hay, nor his great successor, Elihu Root, ever considered necessary to have in the discharge of their duties.

Either I have been grossly misled as to the peculiar qualifications of a single individual whom the President-elect desires, or else a wonderful increase in the activities in the Secretary of State must be contemplated in the very near future.

It is easy to assume, Mr. Speaker, that both the late Secretary John Hay and the gentleman who has just given up the office, Senator-elect Elihu Root, discharged the duties of that great office to the satisfaction of the most strenuous President that the country has seen in its history. Is it possible that that office will be so occupied hereafter that these usual additions in the office of the Secretary are necessary, or is it the purpose to relieve the Secretary of State of some of the labor that his predecessors have voluntarily and willingly done?

I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will not only ask that this conference report go back in order to permit the reduction of the salary of the Secretary of State, but that he will move that the House conferees will be instructed to insist upon the disagreement to the several amendments indicated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. When the Senate proposed these amendments it was intended that the new officers should commence on the 1st of July next, but the House conferees insisted that they should begin on the 4th of March. Evidently this is intended for the new Secretary of State. I am not only willing to permit this gentleman to serve and discharge the duties, but I am anxious to compel him to do as much work as his predecessors have done. So that I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] will make that motion; if he does not, I shall attempt to make it myself.

There is another item of this conference report to which I desire to call the attention of the conferees. There is an amendment that provides for the rental of a storage warehouse for documents of the Senate. They are just completing their $3,000,000 building. They have more room for documents there than they can secure by any amount of rental we may appropriate. I understand that for the convenience of Senators only a single floor of the three floors of that building will be required, so that in addition to the space in the basement there are two floors of that building available for storage purposes. Yet the House conferees are willing to continue the rental of a building for the Senate in order to store its documents. I hope that the conferees will see to it in the next conference that that item also is disallowed.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Do I understand the gentleman's motion is to send the bill back to conference?

Mr. GILLETT. No; it is to disagree to the conference report, and that sends the bill back to the Senate.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then everything upon the bill will be open to amendment as it would originally?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does the gentleman mean to say that a disagreement to a conference report sends it back to the Senate?

Mr. GILLETT. That is my understanding.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If I understand the parliamentary situation, you can not send it back to the Senate by disagreeing to a conference report.

Mr. GILLETT. We disagree to the conference report and the bill goes back to the Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill remains here unless some other action is taken. The Senate has agreed to the conference report and the bill and papers are in the House.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I can not agree, with my present understanding of the parliamentary rules of the House and Senate, that a mere disagreement to a conference report will send the bill back to the Senate, because the House has passed the bill, the Senate has passed the bill with certain amendments, and the House disagreed to those amendments, and the two Houses were in conference about it. Now, the conferees of the two Houses have agreed to most of these Senate amendments.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The House disagrees to this conference report. This bill is in the House to be disposed of as the House sees fit.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That is true. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] said if we disagreed to the conference report it would send the bill back to the Senate, but I want to ask the gentleman where we get the power now to reduce this salary from $12,000, which is provided for the Secretary of State in this bill, to $8,000? If the bill passes now, you have a provision of law for the Secretary of State of $12,000, commencing on the 30th day of June next, which would, as a matter of course, render ineligible the proposed Secretary of State. Now, it goes back to conference. The conferees would have no right to reduce that salary, because that is not a matter in dispute between the two Houses; so, in order to reach this question of providing for the Secretary of State, either the bill must come back into the House or it must go back into the Senate, where some amendment can be made.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And that is the status to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, so that we, if possible, will not go before the country in the attitude of having one day decreased and abolished the salary of the Secretary of State and the next day made it $12,000.

Mr. GILLETT. That is exactly the purpose of this motion. Of course this question of the salary is not in conference. Therefore it is impossible to send it back to conference, because then the question would not be before us, and the state of the case is as the gentleman has said. Therefore the bill itself must be changed in order to conform to the change of salary which we passed the other day. As the gentleman says, inasmuch as that particular clause was not in conference, it would be impossible, or useless, rather, to send it to conference. Therefore the bill itself must be, in one House or the other, acted upon independently and that item changed. That is the reason we first moved to disagree to the conference report.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Having disagreed to the conference report, where does that leave the bill?

Mr. GILLETT. That leaves the bill on the Speaker's table.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; it leaves the bill in the possession of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. What harm would result even if the appropriation bill remained as it is now? The law is that the compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000 per year.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Here is a later law, which says that it is $12,000 a year.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; and we often increase salaries by appropriation bills.

Mr. PERKINS. If a salary has been fixed at $5,000 a year and we appropriate $10,000, then is the man holding office entitled to draw $10,000?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly; that is often done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The effect of passing this bill as it is, taken in connection with the bill that we passed here the day before yesterday, would be that the Secretary of State would draw $8,000 from the 4th day of March until the 1st day of July.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the appropriation bill of last year made it $12,000, and that is available until July.

Mr. MANN. No; that has been repealed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He would draw at the rate of $8,000 a year from the 4th day of March to the 1st day of July, and then he would begin to draw at the rate of $12,000 a year.

Mr. GILLETT. That is correct.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, how much time is remaining of the hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and then five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate our friends on the Republican side of the House on their ability to transact public business. A few days ago we had the momentous question presented to this House of inducting a man into the office of Secretary of State by legislative enactment, and after we had considered that question with two separate bills before us on two different occasions on the same day, we succeeded, not in doing what the majority of this House said they proposed to do—that is, reduce the salary of the Secretary of State from $12,000 a year to $8,000 a year—but after making this attempt to reduce the salary to $8,000, I understand the day's work was thrown away, because they have taken the salary entirely away from the office of Secretary of State. And now, when we find this great legislative bill brought before the House, a few days before our final adjournment, we discover the fact that we have again increased the salary of this office to $12,000 a year.

Now, we have to stop a conference report in the midst of the busy hours of the closing days of Congress; leave the bill lying here on the Speaker's table; let the Senate send a message over here that they would like to have this bill sent back to the Senate in order that they can find out what they want to do.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. The statement was made a few moments ago that the bill as it passed the House left no compensation whatever to the Secretary of State——

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from Minnesota will permit me——

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to finish this statement. I find the RECORD is wrong. The bill which passed both Houses of Congress, signed by the Speaker, the Vice-President, and went to the President, had this clause:

And the annual compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I had not investigated myself——

Mr. TAWNEY. And there is section 2, which does not appear in the RECORD at all, which states:

That on and after March 4, 1909, there shall be no emoluments attached to the office of Secretary of State other than those which by the law in force on the 1st day of May, 1904, belonged and were then attached to said office.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand it, then, I will say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to yield me time enough to finish my statement. I have been interrupted, and I would like to finish my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield further time?

Mr. BINGHAM. How many minutes does the gentleman want?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should desire about five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman on his left desires some time——

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me——

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield the gentleman from Alabama two minutes longer.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, according to the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota, we have the further anomalous position in reference to this matter that the House and the Senate passed a bill having two clauses in it, one reducing the salary and fixing it at $8,000 and the other clause repealing the salary entirely, and that after the two Houses had passed on this proposition that the bill that was presented to the Speaker and Vice-President to be signed had one of the clauses struck out of the bill that was passed by the House; that is, if I understand the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota correctly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the Speaker signed the correct bill as it passed the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I understand, the RECORD shows that, but that as a matter of fact it was not the fact.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; the RECORD does not show that.

Mr. BONYNGE. The RECORD shows the bill as passed did repeal the salary, but the bill as passed had two sections and fixed the salary at $8,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The only thing I rose for, Mr. Speaker, as I stated in the beginning, was to say that here is this great effort being made to induct this gentleman into office by legislative enactment and the House and Senate together are unable to deliver the goods at this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I interrupted the gentleman from Missouri to suggest that the act passed by the House relative to the compensation of the Secretary of State while repealing the increase did not provide for the reinstatement of the old compensation. In making that statement I was in error, and I was in error by relying upon a distinguished Republican colleague and upon the RECORD of the House of Representatives, both the gentleman and the RECORD being wrong. Now, what happened was this: The Clerk read the enrolled bill of the Senate, but the stenographer in reporting the fact simply noted that it was Senate bill 9295, and then inserted the bill in the RECORD as it had been introduced in the Senate, but not as it passed the Senate, so what we ought to do now is to correct the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD be corrected on page 2390 by inserting the terms of the real Senate bill 9295 that was passed by the House instead of the bill that is stated in the RECORD as having been passed, because this is a matter of such importance that we should at least keep the RECORD straight.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to do so, but I shall have to object to the request.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the statement itself makes the correction. I have seen the enrolled bill myself, so I am prepared to state to the House that the Senate bill that was passed by the House is not in terms what the RECORD shows, but is actually the one that was passed by the Senate, in which it is provided in the first clause as follows:

That the annual compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000.

A MEMBER. Ask unanimous consent to correct it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have made that request, and it has been objected to. I move to correct the RECORD on page 2390 by inserting the terms of the real bill that was passed by the House in place of the misstatement contained in the RECORD.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. On that I desire to make the point of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I make the point of order that the motion is not now in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have nine minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, this whole proposition comes as a surprise to the House. No one seems to have discovered this appropriation for $12,000 for the Secretary of State in this bill, and the fact that it has been agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, we made this appropriation. The gentleman is mistaken. I am not surprised that the gentleman from New York does not know the appropriation was made.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope I will not be interrupted and my time taken by a gentleman simply quibbling.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the part of wisdom to postpone this matter until to-morrow morning, and ascertain the best method of correcting this error; because it is an error in view of the legislation passed by both Houses of Congress. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he move to postpone the consideration of this matter until to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BINGHAM. I make that motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman makes that motion, I would like just to say that the RECORD is absolutely correct about this bill that did pass the House on the 15th.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As many as are in favor of the motion will say aye——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to the RECORD, and I call the attention of the House——

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield two minutes to the gentleman. I withhold my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BINGHAM. I withhold my motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the RECORD, so far as the passage of this bill is concerned, is absolutely correct. I have investigated it, and an investigation of the RECORD will show. Turning to page 2408, you will see that the House adopted a rule for the present consideration and passage of Senate bill 9295. The Journal, that was approved yesterday, shows that S. 9295 was the bill that passed this House, and is the bill that is now before the President unless he has approved it. That bill shows that the annual compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000 per annum——

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman permit——

Mr. CLAYTON (continuing). That is the record in relation to the bill that did pass. What happened as to some other bill that did not pass is as a last year's bird nest, and has no place in this discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me? That statement is true. The only place that Senate bill 9295 is printed is on page 2390.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is correct about that, and it is an incorrect print. That print was made in connection with the proceedings when the attempt was made to pass the bill by a suspension of the rule. The bill that did pass under the special rule set out on page 2408 of the RECORD, is in the following words——

Mr. COCKRAN. That is interesting, but not vital.

Mr. CLAYTON (reading)—

An act (S. 9295) in relation to the salary of the Secretary of State.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1907, fixing the annual compensation of heads of executive departments, be, and the same is hereby, repealed in so far as the same relates to the annual compensation of the Secretary of State, and the annual compensation of the Secretary of State shall be at the rate of $8,000.

SEC. 2. That on and after March 4, 1909, there shall be no emoluments attached to the office of Secretary of State other than those which by the law in force on the 1st day of May, 1904, belonged and were then attached to said office.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after March 4, 1909.

This is a bill, Mr. Speaker, for which I voted and which passed the House on the 15th instant.

I have stated the facts, and if the gentleman from New York does not wish to hear any more, I have to say for his benefit that I have concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what he wants to postpone this matter for?

Mr. GILLETT. Because this is a novel situation which has come before the House and in order to determine the best method of correcting it.

Mr. MANN. There is always difficulty when you come to evade the Constitution. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will suspend, and the House will be in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I move the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to disagree to the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, made a few moments ago, was to postpone the further consideration of the proposition until to-morrow, and that is a privileged motion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion for the previous question would take precedence of the motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to postpone was made before the motion for the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a situation that arose in the House during this session. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution laying the President's message on the table. Thereupon a motion for the previous question on the resolution itself was moved, and the Chair ruled that that took precedence and cut out the motion to postpone.

There is now pending a motion to disagree to the conference report, and the gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question on that motion, which takes precedence of the motion to postpone consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion for the previous question will cover both the motion to agree and the motion to postpone, if made. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri to make that motion?

Mr. PAYNE. Under that ruling, I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I make it on the one motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. PAYNE. I move the previous question on the motion to postpone.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is out of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all right, but the other one, made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], takes precedence over it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York, as the Chair understands, moves the previous question on the motion to postpone and on the question of agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri for the previous question on the motion to disagree takes precedence over the motion for the previous question on a subordinate motion to postpone. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] made that motion and is entitled to have it put by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion to postpone ought not to be cut out by a motion for the previous question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that ruling has been specifically made in this session of Congress by the Speaker. The Chair will recall that there was a resolution pending in the House to lay the President's message on the table.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] was recognized, and moved to postpone, and on that motion demanded the previous question. Thereupon the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] moved the previous question on the pending resolution, which was to lay the President's message on the table; and the Speaker, referring to Rule XVI, which provides for the precedence of motions, determined that the motion for the previous question on the main resolution took precedence over the other two motions, and cut out the motion to postpone, with the demand for the previous question pending on that motion. The situation here is analogous.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] moved to agree to the conference report. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moved to postpone until a day certain, to-morrow.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] made that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very well; the gentleman from Pennsylvania made that motion, and it is a privileged motion. Then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] moved the previous question on the first motion, namely, the motion to agree to the conference report, the effect of which would be to cut out the last motion, namely, the motion to postpone. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] then moved the previous question to cover both motions, and the present occupant of the chair is of opinion that the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] takes precedence, and is in order, and so holds.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Can we not now have the conference report read for the information of the House?

Mr. MANN. It has been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that it be read.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order!

Mr. FITZGERALD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. If the previous question be moved on the motion to disagree to the conference report and the motion to postpone, what question would then be submitted to the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to postpone.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that the ruling of the Speaker at this session of Congress distinctly held——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not seem to distinguish——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I distinguish that case.

Mr. PAYNE. He confuses it with a motion to lay the matter on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I submit that the motion for the previous question on the main question takes precedence of the gentleman's motion for the previous question on the main question and the subordinate question.

Mr. PAYNE. Hardly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has ruled. The question is upon the previous question.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yeas and nays!

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 121, answered "present" 4, not voting 91, as follows:

DAVEY, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana. I am informed that three other orders have been passed setting aside the same day for eulogies on three different deceased Members. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this order be set aside.

REPORT OF PROVISIONAL GOVERNOR OF CUBA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 1457), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress the report of the provisional governor of Cuba for the period from December 1, 1907, to December 1, 1908.

PANAMA CANAL—REPORT OF ENGINEERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 1458), which was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith the report of the engineers appointed by me to accompany the ex-Secretary of War, the Hon. William H. Taft, to the Isthmian Canal to look into the condition of the canal work, and especially to report upon the feasibility and safety of the Gatun dam project, with a view to deciding whether or not there should be any change in the plans in accordance with which the canal is being constructed, these plans having been adopted by the Congress. I am happy to report to you that the accompanying document shows in clearest fashion that the Congress was wise in the position it took, and that it would be an inexcusable folly to change from the proposed lock canal to a sea-level canal. In fact, this report not only determines definitely the type of canal, but makes it evident that hereafter attack on this type—the lock type—is in reality merely attack upon the policy of building any canal at all. The board of engineers who signed this report are, of all the men in their profession within or without the United States, the men who are, on the whole, best qualified to pass upon these very questions which they examined. I commend to you the most careful consideration of their report. They show that the only criticism that can be made of the work on the Isthmus is that there has sometimes been almost an excess of caution in providing against possible trouble. As to the Gatun dam itself, they show that not only is the dam safe, but that, on the whole, the plan already adopted would make it needlessly high and strong, and, accordingly, they recommend that the height be reduced by 20 feet, which change in the plans I have accordingly directed. Every American citizen should feel not merely gratification, but a very keen sense of pride in the statement made by this distinguished body of engineers as to the way in which the work has been done and in which it is now proceeding. The American people are to be heartily congratulated on everything of importance that has been done in connection with the building of the Panama Canal.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 20247) entitled "An act to amend section 8 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the keeping of employment agencies in the District of Columbia where fees are charged for procuring employment or situations,' approved June 19, 1906," with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. MANN. I thought the matter had been disposed of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15230) entitled "An act to amend an act approved February 28, 1901, entitled 'An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia,'" with a Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just strikes out the words "sickness or."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What does that accomplish?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I merely desire to find out what the effect of the amendment is. The conference report conveys no intelligence.

The SPEAKER. It strikes out the words "sickness or."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that this bill be laid aside for just a moment, so that I may have an opportunity to examine into it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order, which is the call of committees. The Clerk will call the first committee.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees, and when the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department was called,

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 24148.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 24148) to establish in the Department of the Interior a bureau to be known as the children's bureau.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is a Union Calendar bill.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called,

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill 6102.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill 6102, to further protect the public health and impose additional duties upon the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that bill is not on the proper calendar, that it belongs on the Union Calendar. On page 8 of the bill, line 6, is this provision:

For this and other purposes there shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, on recommendation of the Surgeon-General, a sanitary engineer competent to solve technical problems connected with the purification of water and sewerage, the salary of said engineer to be fixed by the Surgeon-General, on the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not to exceed $5,000 per annum.

That of itself would send it to the Union Calendar.

Mr. HEPBURN. There is no question about that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The bill is referred to the Union Calendar, and the Clerk will call the next committee.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a package of bills reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. From time to time bills have been passed by unanimous consent, and I have not been able to keep track of them. I shall take the opportunity of calling these particular bills that I have in my hand, and if they have been passed the Clerk can inform us. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 29032.

The SPEAKER. What calendar is the bill on?

Mr. HEPBURN. It is on the House Calendar.

Mr. MANN. It is not on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to be upon the calendar.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. We are at the regular order now.

LIFE-PRESERVERS ON MOTOR VESSELS.

Mr. GREENE (when the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called). I call up the bill S. 8266, on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 8266) to require life-preservers on motor vessels.

Be it enacted, etc., That every vessel propelled by machinery other than steam machinery shall carry life-preservers of kinds approved by the board of supervising inspectors, so that there shall be at least one for each person on board.

SEC. 2. That all life-preservers shall be so stowed that their position may be known, and that they may be readily accessible to those for whom they are intended.

SEC. 3. That for any violation of this act the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $10 for each such life-preserver lacking or improperly stowed.

SEC. 4. That this act shall apply to foreign vessels on December 31, 1909.

SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect on June 1, 1909.

Mr. MANN and Mr. FITZGERALD. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration is raised. The question is whether the House will consider the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GREENE. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 44.

So the House decided to consider the bill.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that every vessel propelled by machinery other than steam shall carry life-preservers of a kind approved by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, so that there shall be at least one for each person on board. The department makes the following statement regarding the bill:

The purpose of the bill, which is cordially approved by this department, is to require every motor vessel, when subject to federal jurisdiction, to carry at least one approved life-preserver for each person on board.

I certainly think that the bill ought to pass. It is in the interest of the preservation of human life. A number of accidents have occurred by reason of explosions on motor vessels, and there is no provision of law that requires them to be equipped with life-preservers.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does this bill apply to all motor boats, those used for pleasure as well as those that carry passengers for hire?

Mr. GREENE. Yes, sir; it applies to every motor vessel propelled by either naphtha or gasoline.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does the gentleman think it necessary to have gasoline and naphtha boats used simply for pleasure equipped with life-preservers?

Mr. GREENE. I certainly think so. People's lives going out for pleasure on boats of this character or those who go out as passengers ought equally to be preserved, and the risk is greater on the pleasure boats.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I would say to the gentleman that I represent a district that is on the coast in part, where we have quite a number of these gasoline boats. I agree with the gentleman that where gasoline boats are carrying passengers for hire they ought to be required, doubtless, to have life-preservers, but I do not think life-preservers necessary on all gasoline boats.

Mr. GREENE. This bill is very simple. It provides that every motor boat, whether it carries passengers for hire or for pleasure or otherwise, shall be equipped with life-preservers.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that the testimony before the committee showed that the cost of life-preservers is almost a nominal figure, costing from $1.25 to $2, and motor boats, whether they carry one passenger or a hundred passengers, ought to be provided with life-preservers. Now, every vessel, whether it be a motor boat for use by those who own it or for passengers, will be required to have them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are not vessels carrying passengers required to have life-preservers?

Mr. HINSHAW. All vessels except motor boats.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are not motor boats of a certain dimension, regardless of whether they carry passengers for hire or not, required to have them?

Mr. HINSHAW. If motor boats carried passengers for pleasure, under the law they were not required to have life-preservers for each passenger.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What does the gentleman mean by motor boats?

Mr. HINSHAW. Propelled by electricity, gasoline, or anything except steam.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken, because I have been on boats that will hold five or six people, and there is hardly room for the passengers because of all the truck they are now required to have under the law.

Mr. GREENE. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO].

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Before the gentleman yields, I would like to say I agree with the gentleman from Nebraska, that where motor boats carry passengers for hire they should have life-preservers, but I can not see any reason why all small motor boats that do not carry passengers for hire should be required to furnish life-preservers. I believe that is unnecessary, and might be a hardship in some instances. This bill is quite broad and sweeping in its provisions.

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state whether or not the committee has any statistics to show the proportion of the loss of life by drowning among passengers in motor boats, especially of the small character referred to, and persons traveling by rowboats or canoe?

Mr. GREENE. I have no statistics, but we had considerable testimony before the committee to show that there was great loss of life on account of this lack of equipment.

Mr. DENBY. Is it not true that the loss of life from motor boats is practically negligible, while the loss of life from rowboats, canoes, and among people going in swimming is very great?

Mr. GREENE. It may be.

Mr. DENBY. There is practically no loss of life from motor boats.

Mr. GREENE. Unquestionably there is loss of life. I have known it in the harbor of the city where I live, and the Commissioner of Navigation appeared personally before the committee and said that last summer two clerks from his office lost their lives by reason of the fact that there were no life-preservers at hand when an accident happened to the boat and the occupants were thrown into the river. It very frequently happens. The use of these boats is growing very common, and the committee believe there should be a provision of law to provide for the better protection of human life. This bill has passed the Senate and is reported by the committee as advisable.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. SULZER. As I understand it, this bill compels all motor boats inspected by the Government to carry life-preservers?

Mr. GREENE. All motor boats propelled by any kind of machinery will be compelled to carry life-preservers for as many persons as they have on board.

Mr. SULZER. That is right, in my opinion. I believe this is a good bill, and I trust it will pass.

Mr. DAWSON. Do the terms of this bill apply to motor boats used on the inland rivers of the United States?

Mr. GREENE. All motor boats that come under the jurisdiction of the inspection department of the United States. If they are not under the supervision of the inspection department, the bill would not apply.

Mr. DAWSON. Then, do I understand that by the terms of this bill a motor boat operated on a little lake or an inland river wholly within a State would be affected?

Mr. GREENE. I am not a lawyer, as the gentleman is, and I can not answer his categorical question.

Mr. DAWSON. Is there anyone favoring the bill who can answer it?

Mr. GREENE. If they are subject to inspection by the United States inspectors, the owners of boats would be liable.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to say to him that this bill is so broad that it covers all boats, whether they come within the jurisdiction of the United States inspectors or not.

Mr. GREENE. It ought to be broad, because it is for the preservation of human life.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It does cover all boats, whether they come within the United States inspection laws or not.

Mr. GREENE. We have no jurisdiction over anything except what comes under the inspection laws of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. That is a question of law.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Where does this bill say that it is limited to boats that come under the United States inspection service?

Mr. HASKINS. The United States Government has no jurisdiction over anything else.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Boats of less than 15 tons are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. This bill says every vessel propelled by machinery other than steam. It turns on the definition of the word "vessel."

Mr. GREENE. Very well; make it as broad as you like. I want it broad enough to preserve human life.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Let us see if you mean that.

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Along the coast of the United States, from Florida to New England, are fishermen and oyster men engaged in their occupation who go out alone. They have substituted a small power engine for oars. Do you mean that such a boat would be subject to the provisions of this bill?

Mr. GREENE. If there is one man in the boat they will be required to have one life-preserver in the boat.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. And in case a neighbor is in distress, he must be denied a passage home because there is only one life-preserver in the boat?

Mr. GREENE. There is always discretion in regard to such matters. I do not think any official would enforce a penalty in such a case as the gentleman alludes to.

Mr. SULZER. That is pretty farfetched.

Mr. GREENE. We are not trying to pass a narrow law. We are trying to pass a broad law that will cover every reasonable proposition. I think the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey is altogether unreasonable.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think it is a reasonable proposition to require the oyster men and the fishermen who use the small engines instead of oars at times to be brought by this sweeping language of the bill under government jurisdiction?

Mr. GREENE. I most certainly do.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The proposition, to me, is absurd.

Mr. WALDO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WALDO. In the navigable waters, from Maine to Florida, there are a large number of canoes carrying only one person fitted with motors so that they are removable and they can leave the motor ashore and propel it by paddle, or they can run it with a motor——

Mr. GREENE. How many men do they carry?

Mr. WALDO. One passenger.

Mr. GREENE. Then, under this bill they would only have to carry one life-preserver.

Mr. WALDO. Does the gentleman think that that man should be liable to a fine of $10 if he failed——

Mr. GREENE. I think he should; the gentleman need not lengthen out his question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state what boats now, by law, come under the federal inspection?

Mr. GREENE. That is covered by a general statute.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the general statute?

Mr. GREENE. I am not a lawyer, like the gentleman from Michigan, and I can not answer the question.

Mr. DAWSON rose.

Mr. GREENE. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to ask whether any testimony was taken by the committee as to the necessity for this legislation, especially as it applies to motor boats operating on the inland rivers of the United States, where accidents occur practically never?

Mr. GREENE. If these waters are within the jurisdiction of the United States it was considered. There was testimony of the dangers of allowing these vessels to go without life-preservers.

Mr. BANNON. I would like to state that accidents frequently do happen on the inland waters and these rivers, the navigable waters of this country; they frequently happen on the Ohio River by explosion of these motor boats.

Mr. DAWSON. That may be true of the Ohio River, but it never occurs on the Mississippi.

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DENBY. I would like to ask what, in the opinion of the committee, this bill actually covers?

Mr. GREENE. Every motor boat that comes under the jurisdiction of the United States inspector.

Mr. DENBY. But there is no such limitation in the bill.

Mr. GREENE. It can not go any further than that. It is under the jurisdiction of the United States inspector.

Mr. DENBY. What is the jurisdiction of the United States inspector?

Mr. GREENE. Any waters of the United States.

Mr. DENBY. What size of boats?

Mr. GREENE. All boats propelled by machinery.

Mr. DENBY. Of any size?

Mr. GREENE. Propelled by machinery, and under the law a motor boat is propelled by machinery, although it may not have an engine as large as a steam engine.

Mr. DENBY. Does the gentleman contend that every boat propelled by machinery is under United States inspection?

Mr. GREENE. I think so, although I am not a lawyer.

Mr. DENBY. But I think the House ought to know.

Mr. GREENE. I am telling the gentleman what I think, that it would cover every vessel that is propelled by machinery; by gasoline or naphtha or any explosive material, and even any nonexplosive material, is covered by this bill, and requires one life-preserver for every person.

Mr. DENBY. Does the gentleman think the bill ought to be voted for, when the committee can not explain the extent of its jurisdiction?

Mr. GREENE. I am explaining it with all the knowledge that I have.

Mr. DENBY. But we want all the knowledge there is on the subject.

Mr. GREENE. I am stating all the knowledge I have, and the gentleman from Michigan does not seem to have any.

Mr. DENBY. I am not advocating the bill; if I was, I would know more about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANNON. I would suggest that the gentleman from Michigan is a good lawyer and very familiar with maritime law, and I think he understands to what class of cases this will apply.

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman from Ohio explain?

Mr. BANNON. I would not attempt to explain to such an eminent authority on this subject as the gentleman from Michigan. I think the United States has jurisdiction over navigable waters for purposes of navigation.

Mr. DENBY. Would the gentleman from Ohio ask the gentleman from Michigan to vote for a bill that the committee could not explain? The gentleman from Michigan can not vote for any such bill.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is it not the law now that every motor boat that carries passengers for hire shall be provided with life-preservers?

Mr. GREENE. Yes; but this bill compels all boats to carry life-preservers. This provision simply covers every vessel that has persons on board, and requires one life-preserver for every person on board.

Mr. BENNET of New York. This adds boats that are operated simply for the individual pleasure of their owners to that class.

Mr. GREENE. Yes; and they are not as likely to have competent persons in command as those who carry for hire.

Mr. WEBB. I notice in section 3 of the bill that a penalty is provided, that for any violation of the act the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $10 for each such life-preserver lacking or improperly stowed.

Mr. GREENE. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Is that a criminal or a civil penalty?

Mr. GREENE. I suppose it is a criminal penalty.

Mr. WEBB. I think it ought to be, if the gentleman expects to carry out the purpose of the bill. I am afraid it is not. The bill does not say he shall be fined, but simply that he is subject to a penalty.

Mr. GREENE. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. WEBB. I think it is purely a civil penalty that is provided.

Mr. GREENE. A life-preserver can be purchased for $1, and that would not be burdensome on a boat owner.

Mr. WEBB. The penalty is undoubtedly civil, and not criminal.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will yield some time.

Mr. GREENE. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five or ten minutes.

Mr. GREENE. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, under the law at present all boats operated by steam, gasoline, electricity, or naphtha, which carry passengers for hire, are required to have life-preservers. The object of this bill is to compel the owner of every small power boat to place on the boat life-preservers for as many people as may happen to be in it. There are a great many small power boats with machinery of 1 horsepower or 1½ horsepower. After machinery is put in the boat and one or two persons enter it there is absolutely no room, not only for life-preservers, but even for a lunch basket. This bill requires these life-preservers to be properly stowed. There is no place to stow a life-preserver or anything else in many of these boats. They are nothing but a small shell, strong enough to sustain the racking of machinery that develops from one-half to 1½ horsepower. This bill, if passed, would prove an intolerable nuisance to men using these small power boats, but it evidently will be very welcome to those manufacturing life-preservers. I have known of instances where those in some of the boats that are required to have life-preservers, supposedly for the protection or safety of the people on board, found it necessary to throw the life-preservers overboard in order to keep the boat from being swamped, and thereby imperiling the lives of people in them.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman how much, in his judgment, an increase of inspectors it would take to enforce this law in the harbor of New York alone?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not able to say exactly, but it would easily require many thousand additional inspectors for the entire United States. On the Great South Bay, which runs practically from about Rockaway Beach the entire length of Long Island—perhaps 90 miles—there are thousands and thousands of these small power boats, which are operated by the people who own them for their own comfort, convenience, and pleasure. There is no danger in the operation of these boats. Wherever they carry passengers for hire they are strictly inspected, and the regulations require that they carry whatever may be necessary to protect the lives of the passengers. No one is more interested in the protection of his own life than the man who owns a boat which he is operating for his own pleasure. To compel life-preservers to be placed on many small boats, instead of helping to protect life, would be an embarrassment and a disadvantage. I hope, when we consider the great number of these small boats now in operation—not only, as I have said, on the Great South Bay in New York, but in the harbors of New York and in every place in the United States where there are small bodies of water—that the House will not vote to impose such requirements, with the resulting enormous necessary increase of steamboat inspectors and with no real good being accomplished.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the law to be now that all boats that carry passengers for hire are required to provide them with life-preservers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The act of May 16, 1906, so provides.

Mr. CAMPBELL. This would, then, require a private individual, who has a private boat suitable for his own use and that of his family, to put life-preservers in?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would require a man who keeps a boat to fish in or out of, whichever may be the correct expression, and who puts a small engine in it to save himself the trouble of rowing it, to put a life-preserver in it. In my judgment, there would be more reason, more necessity for life-preservers in rowboats than for life-preservers on these small power boats, and I hope that the House will not pass this ridiculous bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to know by whom this bill was introduced.

Mr. GREENE. The bill was introduced upon the request of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. DRISCOLL. And nobody appears here as the father of this bill.

Mr. GREENE. I introduced it in the House, and a similar bill is on the calendar.

Mr. DRISCOLL. There is no name, and it seems to be fatherless.

Mr. GREENE. The bill in the Senate was introduced by Senator FRYE.

Mr. DRISCOLL. His name does not appear on it.

Mr. GREENE. I can not help that; this is an act—it is not a bill—of the Senate. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, just one more question.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa desires to ask me a question.

Mr. DAWSON. Would it not be preferable to require passengers to wear these life-preservers, rather than store them away on the boats?

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GREENE) there were—ayes 43, noes 70.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EQUIPMENT OF MOTOR BOATS WITH MUFFLERS.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 27479.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 27479) to require motor vessels to be equipped with mufflers.

Be it enacted, etc., That every vessel propelled in whole or in part by gas, gasoline, petroleum, or naphtha shall be provided with an underwater exhaust or with suitable mufflers.

SEC. 2. That for any violation of this act the owner shall be liable to a penalty of $25.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1909.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to compel owners of motor boats to place upon said boats mufflers of some kind so as to do away with the intolerable noise caused in propelling said boats as they are now run. This noise has become a menace to navigation and a nuisance to the people on shore, particularly in the very early morning hours and late at night. Heretofore the Department of Commerce and Labor has been unable to minimize or abate this nuisance because of lack of authority, and this bill gives them the authority needed. The bill has the indorsement of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman be willing to accept an amendment requiring mufflers to be placed upon all automobiles and crying babies if engaged in interstate commerce?

Mr. GREENE. I will not. Does the gentleman want to propound another question?

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman differentiate between automobiles that run along where there are many people and the motor boat which runs where there are very few?

Mr. GREENE. That is something that is entirely out of the jurisdiction of the committee which I represent. The committee which I represent deals with water, not land. That matter more properly belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. It has been suggested here that the gentleman was at sea and not on land on this bill.

Mr. GREENE. I can understand that——

Mr. MANN. What reason is there for requiring mufflers on motor boats and not requiring them on automobiles?

Mr. GREENE. The same kind of engine is required for motor boats that is on automobiles, and I think the automobiles are very frequently equipped with mufflers; and if there is anything required in that regard, it belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which committee the gentleman is a member, and they have neglected their duty if they have not reported a bill.

Mr. MANN. That may be; but I notice the bill the gentleman had up before came apparently with the force of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. A bill is reported to the House, and a copy of the bill is before the House, which stated that the bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and again on the back referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and again referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed. There is nothing to indicate that the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has any jurisdiction of that bill, which doubtless they did not have, except——

Mr. GREENE. The bill was properly before the House by proper action taken by the House and the committee on the same.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Except by order of the House, although that was not shown until we discovered it here.

Mr. GREENE. It is properly on the calendar, and I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On division (demanded by Mr. GREENE) there were—ayes 39, noes 70.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Thirty-seven gentlemen have arisen; not a sufficient number. Being in the House, it takes one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. PARSONS. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SHERLEY. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The refusal to order to a third reading accomplishes what the gentleman asks.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bill has been refused a third reading, and that is a defeat of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand, Mr. Speaker; but "the gentleman" calls the Chair's attention to the fact that just a few moments ago, when a similar proceeding was had, the Chair entertained a motion that the bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did entertain the motion. That was one way of giving it the final stroke.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is just what I desire to do in this case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the gentleman, Is not this the final stroke? If the gentleman desires to buckle up the final stroke, and move to reconsider and lay that motion on the table, it would save one motion.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right; I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was denied a third reading, and to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 51.

Mr. PARSONS. Tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Thirty gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. PARSONS. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not require a quorum to vote; it is a question of a quorum being present.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am glad to hear that correct statement of parliamentary law from the gentleman from Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count and see if a quorum is present. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventy gentlemen are present; a quorum. The ayes have it, and the motion to reconsider and lay on the table is agreed to.

LAKE CHAMPLAIN TERCENTENARY CELEBRATION.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in order that I may call up House resolution 257.

Mr. FITZGERALD and others. What is it?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. It is a joint resolution authorizing the Department of State to invite the Governments of Great Britain and France to a participation in the three hundredth anniversary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 257) to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the Governments of France and Great Britain to participate in the proposed tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain.

Whereas the States of New York and Vermont, by legislation and appropriation, have authorized the celebration of the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain; and

Whereas the date of the said celebration has been fixed for the first week in July, 1909: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to extend to the Governments of France and Great Britain an invitation to be represented at and to participate in the proposed celebration during the first week of July, 1909, to commemmorate the three hundredth anniversary of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, there is very little to be said by way of explanation of this resolution. A very full report accompanies it explaining fully the significance of the proposed celebration. As indicated in the preamble, both the States of New York and Vermont have appropriated money for this celebration, which will occur during the first week of next July. While these two States have taken the initiative, the occasion will be one of national significance. We are already assured that the President of the United States will be present and participate in the exercises. And the occasion will be one of international importance. For this reason it is desired that authority be given the State Department to extend an invitation to the two nations most intimately associated with the United States in the historic event which this celebration will commemorate. It was a son of France who discovered the beautiful body of water that bears his name. Canada, that loyal dominion of Great Britain, borders upon the lake. It is peculiarly desirable, therefore, that an invitation be extended to the Governments of France and Great Britain to participate in the celebration.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell how large an expense there will be to the Government by the passage of this resolution?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Why, it is simply the expense of taking care of the representatives of these Governments. I think the majority of us would say that $25,000 would be the outside sum. We would not naturally expect a large delegation from France or from Great Britain. It would be very gratifying if Ambassadors Bryce and Jusserand could be with us. We do expect quite a delegation from Canada. But in any event we do not foresee any large expense resulting from this invitation. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The joint resolution was ordered engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER. Any other reports from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GREENE. No.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McMORRAN. I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his motion.

Mr. McMORRAN. I desire to move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the bill (S. 48) to reimburse depositors of the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

The SPEAKER. But that motion is not privileged until the expiration of sixty minutes.

Mr. McMORRAN. I understood that the sixty minutes expired at 1.25 p. m.

The SPEAKER. No; 1.35, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 27971) authorizing the Attorney-General to appoint as special peace officers such employees of the Alaska school service as may be named by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

PENAL CODE.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. On behalf of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the penal code (H. R. 11701).

Mr. McMORRAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order, as the time is not up. It lacks one minute.

The SPEAKER. As nearly as the Chair can determine, it seems to be 25 minutes to 3, and did seem to be that when the Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The voting on the motion is equivalent to the question of consideration.

Mr. McMORRAN. I move to amend by substituting Senate bill 48.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. McMORRAN] moves to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by substituting a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 48) to reimburse depositors of the late Freedman's Savings and Trust Company.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McMORRAN, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. McMORRAN. Tellers!

Tellers were refused, 11 Members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 137.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I raised the question of consideration. That ought to be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The House is in process of determining consideration now. To vote down this motion will be to refuse to consider it.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PARKER. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 151, noes 21.

Accordingly the motion of Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania was agreed to; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the penal code bill (H. R. 11701), with Mr. CURRIER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking whether there are still copies of the bill under consideration to be had by the Members of the House? It is impossible to follow the sections as they are read, and impossible to consider the amendments unless we have copies of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no information on that subject.

The Chair assumes that there are copies of the bill in the document room.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am informed there are none.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a matter for the Chair——

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers the following substitute for his amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert new sections after section 236, to stand as sections 236a, 236b, and 236c, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 236a. That any officer, agent, or employee of any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, who shall knowingly deliver or cause to be delivered to any person other than the person to whom it has been consigned, unless upon the written order in each instance of the bona fide consignee, or to any fictitious person, or to any person under a fictitious name, any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind which has been shipped from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 236b. That any railroad company, express company, or other common carrier, or any other person who, in connection with the transportation of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall collect the purchase price or any part thereof, before, on, or after delivery, from the consignee, or from any other person, or shall in any manner act as the agent of the buyer or seller of any such liquor, for the purpose of buying or selling or completing the sale thereof, saving only in the actual transportation and delivery of the same, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"SEC. 236c. That whoever shall ship or cause to be shipped, from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, into any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any foreign country into any State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, any package of or package containing any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, unless such package be so labeled on the outside cover as to plainly show the name of the consignee, the nature of its contents, and the quantity contained therein, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and such liquor shall be forfeited to the United States, and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the seizure and forfeiture of property imported into the United States contrary to law."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the substitute which I have just offered contains three provisos: First, that no intoxicating liquor that enters into interstate commerce shall be delivered to anyone except the consignee or upon his written order. The second section forbids all c. o. d. business in intoxicating liquor which enters into interstate commerce. The third section requires the package containing the liquors to be so labeled as plainly to show the name of the consignee, the kind and the quantity of the liquors contained therein.

I have offered this as a substitute because there has been much discussion in the last few years of the numerous bills presented along this line, and quite a number have questioned the constitutionality of the main features of these bills. But this substitute is agreed upon all hands to be clearly within the constitutional limits set about us, and has been reported by the Senate committee which had this and a number of similar bills under consideration, and is known generally as the "Knox bill." It does not seek to forbid the interstate shipment of intoxicating liquors. It does not delegate to the States the power to regulate interstate commerce. It simply provides that when liquors do enter into interstate commerce they shall be so labeled as to indicate the truth, and that is all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I will.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On page 2, line 7, after the word "carrier," would it not be advisable to add "or any officer, agent, or employee of such companies or common carrier?"

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I want to say to the gentleman that this bill has been subjected to scrutiny, to relentless scrutiny, by a number of the gentlemen on this floor, by committees of the House, and it has been agreed that the language of this particular amendment comes about as near expressing the will of the House as it is possible to make it. Personally, I would not object to that, but after about six weeks of careful consideration in conference with a great many gentlemen on this floor, it has been agreed as the part of wisdom to stick to the language in effect as agreed upon by the Senate committee and by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of this House.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am in thorough sympathy with the measure, and I wish it to be effective. I do not see how you can imprison a company. I understand, however, that this matter will receive attention in conference, and I will not insist on the amendment here. I trust that the House will adopt the substitute of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I was not advised that this matter would come up until a few moments ago, and consequently I am not prepared to discuss, as I would like to discuss, so important a subject as this. In a few words and in the few minutes which are at my disposal I should like to call the attention of the House to what it is proposed to do here.

You propose to single out a certain legitimate article of interstate commerce and subject its shipment to restrictions which must certainly be obnoxious to a great number of citizens. As we all know, in every prohibition State there is a minority. Where prohibition has been in force a majority has voted for it, but there is a minority, and in many cases a very large minority, which has voted against it. This legislation is intended to make it difficult, if not impossible, to that minority to satisfy their desires with respect to personal taste. It does more than that, Mr. Chairman; it holds up every man who dares to order a bottle of wine or a glass of beer for his family table—it holds him up to public notice and subjects him to regulations made by the constables and the policemen of every prohibition State.

This legislation is un-American for the reasons stated, and we should not go so far as to tyrannize the minority of these States where the majority has voted for prohibition.

There is another question involved. I am quite sure if the people who have voted for prohibition had known that you would make it difficult or impossible for them to secure what they wanted for their family table by importing it from the outside that their votes would not have been cast in favor of prohibitory legislation at all. Many of them favored such a measure on the theory that the other fellow would be prevented from securing it, and that they themselves could get it by importation from elsewhere. These are a few considerations which prompt me to vote against this amendment. If it should be the desire of the House to pass it, I would suggest an amendment, which I will read in a minute and which will deal even-handed justice with respect to all articles containing alcohol.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose is to insert after the words "liquors of any kind," wherever they occur, the following:

Cider and so-called temperance drinks and all other beverages containing more than 3 per cent of alcohol.

I take it that the purpose of this legislation is to strike down alcohol. It can not be excused on any other ground, and if that is the purpose, Mr. Chairman, then we should extend this legislation to all beverages and to all fluids which may contain alcohol. It has been stated by chemical experts that cider, for instance, sweet cider, contains more alcohol than beer; and it has also been ascertained by Doctor Wiley, of the Agricultural Department, that most of the drinks sold as temperance drinks in this country contain more alcohol than beer. Why, then, discriminate against beer in favor of the other beverages containing alcohol?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is the intention of his amendment to compel the shipper of the package to declare on the label the percentage of alcohol contained in it?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The same provisions that apply to liquor should apply to these beverages.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, if it has less than 3 per cent, it is not necessary to label it as carrying alcohol. Is that the idea?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I now offer this amendment, which I send to the desk, and ask to have it again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the words "liquors of any kind," wherever they occur, the following:
"Cider and so-called temperance drinks and all other beverages containing more than 3 per cent of alcohol."

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in speaking to the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Missouri, I want to say that I think that is a very unimportant question compared to the real issues involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. I am very much in hopes that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi will pass, because of the fact that the legislation in many States of the Union at the present time emphasizes the necessity for legislation along this line by the National Congress. This amendment does not accomplish all the relief that many of the States have hoped for from Congress. It does not go far enough; but it is in the right direction, and it will not prevent more effective legislation hereafter, but will be an aid to accomplishing that end. I believe that a very large majority of the people of the Southern States, and the Northern States, as well, are in favor of a more extensive provision than this. They would be in favor, in other words, of a law that would prohibit the shipping of liquors into States where the sale and traffic in liquors is forbidden by the laws of those States. There has for a long time been a demand for legislation of this kind all over the country. As yet those favoring it have not been able to get that legislation, because so many questions have been raised, constitutional questions, as to whether or not it was within the power of Congress to pass a law to accomplish that end.

This amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi is, I think, free from these objections. It is the opinion of those who have considered the question very carefully that this amendment is certainly subject to no constitutional objection. Now, then, in order that the States may more effectively carry into effect the laws they have enacted, or may hereafter enact, I favor this amendment. It will be of very great benefit and help to this end. The provisions are reasonable and fair. They provide that these shipments shall be made to the real purchaser, and that they shall be delivered only to him or upon his written order. That provision itself will do a great deal to enable the State through its officials to prevent the illegal traffic, to prevent the agent from delivering whisky to parties under fictitious names, and thereby aiding these parties in going into what is called the "boot-legging business," and various kinds of subterfuges to evade the law and sell whisky.

It also has a provision to prevent express companies or common carriers from collecting from the consignee or purchaser any amount except the fees for transportation. It puts a stop to the shipment of liquors c. o. d., and thus prevents express or railroad agents from collecting pay for the liquor and from becoming virtually the agents of the liquor dealers in selling their goods. This provision can work no injustice to anyone, and, I think, should commend itself to all persons who desire the States to be able to put into effect laws enacted by the States to restrict the sale of liquors.

Another provision of the amendment is that the package shipped shall be so labeled as to show the name of the consignee and the nature and quantity of its contents. It may not be agreeable to all persons who desire to purchase whisky that the fact of the purchase be made known, yet every good citizen who desires to see the laws of his country maintained and enforced should, if he desires to purchase liquor for his own use, be willing to do so with this publicity, in order that the real transaction can be known and the officers of the law be thus aided in discovering its violators and apprehending the same. No good citizen should hesitate to take the responsibility for his own acts when the public welfare demands it. And, Mr. Chairman, I think this provision will not only aid in suppressing the illegal traffic in whisky, but will exercise a wholesome effect upon the man who purchases it legally.

The argument is made that you can not enforce these temperance laws, and for that reason they ought not to be enacted. Mr. Chairman, in order that they may be better able to enforce laws prohibiting the sale of liquor, I favor this amendment, and while it is not all that I would like to see passed or that the people of my State would like to see passed, especially since they have enacted laws lately prohibiting the sale of liquor in that State, yet it is a step in the right direction and I hope it will pass.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and the amendments thereto cease in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, regarding this amendment, that it does not go far enough. The words "spirituous liquors" should be more definite than they are in this bill or amendment. I hold in my hand a list of medicinal preparations, issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and of the entire number he designates about 50 as containing sufficient alcohol to class them as spirituous liquors, on which an annual license of $25 should be paid. Among them are such as "Uncle Joe's Dyspepsia Cure." [Laughter.] All of these so-called "medicinal preparations" should be specified in the bill now under consideration. Of course we all understand the intent of this bill. It is to "spot" every single person that obtains any spirituous, malt, or vinous liquor, and it will also include the ministers who now get wine for the ministration of the holy sacrament.

Why, some will say, "You ought to use unfermented wine for the sacrament," but the papers stated a few days ago that in a Methodist conference in North Carolina the matter was brought up relative to the use of unfermented wine, and the report was tabled with the following comments: "Unfermented wine is unfermented nonsense; Christ prescribed wine and not grape juice." I certainly hope that the bill will not pass. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I oppose not only the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio but I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. I oppose any attempt to put upon this bill absolutely new legislation. It is not my purpose to speak extensively upon this subject now. More than once during the progress of this bill I have voiced my sentiments as chairman of this committee respecting that kind of legislation. This has never passed any committee of this House, it has never been considered carefully by any committee, nor been reported to this House, and the position that I have constantly taken upon this subject is that this House has not the time, sitting as the Committee of the Whole House, to wisely perfect important legislation, and I therefore oppose the amendment to the section and also the section itself.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can be recognized for one minute before the time expires.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to say that if a codification bill is ever to be properly considered there must be some rule of practice entered by which only verbal amendments or those which express the present law can be taken up without unanimous consent; otherwise we shall have every topic on legislation from the creation to the present time on this bill. I desire again to say this, touching upon this present amendment, that it would say to any one of my constituents in the city of Newark, N. J., 10 miles from New York, that he could not make a purchase of a dozen bottles of whisky in the city of New York and send it over to his house without having put on the box the name of the man in big letters in full and his address and the exact kind and quantity of liquor, for public or private notice, and yet in both of those cities the dealing in liquors is not restrained. This puts a restraint upon States where there is now no restraint. No such amendment can be properly considered in the Committee of the Whole House, and this ought to be voted down and a rule introduced which would make this a revision and not a new law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the substitute.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, what is the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BARTHOLDT) there were—ayes 32, noes 94.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SABATH) there were—ayes 129, noes 40.

So the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER) there were—ayes 116, noes 34.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 238. It shall be unlawful for any person to deliver to any common carrier for transportation, or for any common carrier to transport from any State, Territory, or District of the United States, to any other State, Territory, or District thereof, any foreign animals or birds, the importation of which is prohibited, or the dead bodies or parts thereof of any wild animals or birds, where such animals or birds have been killed or shipped in violation of the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which the same were killed, or from which they were shipped: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the transportation of any dead birds or animals during the season when the same may be lawfully captured, and the export of which is not prohibited by law in the State, Territory, or District in which the same are captured or killed: Provided further, That nothing herein shall prevent the importation, transportation, or sale of birds or bird plumage manufactured from the feathers of barnyard fowls.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on line 2, page 129, after the word "animals," by inserting the word "killed." This is a verbal omission in the print of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 129, line 2, after the word "animals," insert the word "killed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 239. All packages containing animals, birds, or parts thereof, when shipped as provided in the section last preceding, shall be plainly and clearly marked, so that the name and address of the shipper, and the nature of the contents, may be readily ascertained on inspection of the outside of such packages.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer, as a substitute to section 239, the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a substitute for section 239 the following:

"SEC. 239. All packages containing the dead bodies or the plumage or parts thereof of game animals or other wild birds, when shipped in interstate or foreign commerce, shall be plainly and clearly marked, so that the name and address of the shipper and the nature of the content may be readily ascertained on an inspection of the outside of such packages."

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is simply an amendment to correct certain defects found in this section by one or two decisions of the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MANN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead.

PENAL CODE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 241. Whoever shall bring or cause to be brought into the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, from any foreign country, for the purpose of disposing of the same, or shall therein knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company or other common carrier, for carriage from one State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, to any other State, Territory, or District of the United States, or place noncontiguous to but subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any place in or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States through a foreign country to any place in or subject to the jurisdiction thereof, or from any place in or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to a foreign country, any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character, or any drug, medicine, article, or thing designed, adapted, or intended for preventing conception, or producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use, or any written or printed card, letter, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where, how, or of whom, or by what means, any of the hereinbefore-mentioned articles, matters, or things may be obtained or made; or whoever shall take from such express company or other common carrier with intent to sell, distribute, or circulate any matter or thing the depositing of which for carriage is herein made unlawful, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 129, in line 25, and on page 130, in line 1, strike out the words "for the purpose of disposing of the same;" also, on page 130, in line 11, after the word "lascivious," insert the following: ", and every filthy;" also, on same page, in line 20, strike out the word "take" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "knowingly take or cause to be taken;" also, in lines 21 and 22, same page, strike out the words "with intent to sell, distribute, or circulate."

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are four amendments offered together, and the reason that they are offered together is the fact that they are all amendments to the same section and all go to accomplish the same purpose. In order that the House may understand the purpose of each amendment and its effect, it is proper to read them all. I will state further that this is in perfect keeping with the amendment to the section regarding the transportation through the mails of obscene literature, books, and so forth, and it makes the same provision in this section.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. On behalf of the committee, the amendments are accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

After section 241 insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 241a. It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, or corporation to offer, grant, or give, or to solicit, accept, or receive, any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce by any common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof whereby any such property shall by any device whatever be transported at a less rate than that named in the tariffs published and filed by such carriers, as is required by said act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or whereby any other advantage is given or discrimination is practiced, and every person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or give, or solicit, accept or receive any such rebate, concession, or discrimination shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $20,000: Provided, That any person, or any officer or director of any corporation subject to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce and the acts amendatory thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, or agent, or person acting for or employed by any such corporation, who shall be convicted as aforesaid shall, in addition to the fine herein provided, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in order to carry out the interstate-commerce laws and to provide for punishment for their violation. We have had a good deal said and done and written about the enforcement of the interstate-commerce law and proceedings against violators of the antitrust law; but though a great deal has been said and a good many trumpets have been blown and drums battered, Mr. Chairman, we find that wherever the enforcement of the law has been made it has been made against the corporations, and they have been punished by fine only. Now, if we are going to make it effective when we are here undertaking to codify the criminal laws of the land, I see no reason why the committee, when dealing with that part of the bill which is for the purpose of defining crimes against the interstate-commerce law, should have left out this provision of the existing law.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that the committee have not left it out at all; and I believe, as far as I am able to recall it, the language included in the amendment is to-day existing law. It has been explained to the House more than once that a great number of the penal provisions that are embodied in the administrative features of other laws could not be separated, and therefore from those features we have made no attempt to put them in this act. Now I will ask the gentleman a question. In what respect does this section differ from the existing law known as the "antitrust law?"

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This law provides for the indictment and prosecution of the officers of the corporations who engage in the business.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. So does the existing law, and as I understand various indictments have been found and prosecuted under its provisions.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In what respect does the gentleman's amendment differ from the Elkins antirebate law?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not think it differs very much. This provides for the punishment of the officers of the corporations who engage in rebating, and so forth.

Mr. MANN. So does that.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. MANN. Now, this law covers all corporations——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Engaged in interstate commerce, yes.

Mr. MANN. It covers all corporations receiving or giving a rebate or giving or receiving less freight charges than are offered to some one else for the same service.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. But the existing law permits a municipal corporation, for instance, to have freight carried for a less rate.

Mr. COCKRAN. A person who accepts a rebate is liable, is he not?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If this applied only to railroad corporations, it would not go far enough.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The language of the amendment is that it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation to offer, or grant, or give, or solicit, or receive any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect to transportation.

Mr. MANN. That does not relate to the railway corporation. That relates to the individual.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Sure.

Mr. MANN. Now, the present law, whether rightly or wrongly, permits a municipal corporation to receive a discrimination in its favor in freight rates. The gentleman's amendment, of course, would change that.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Why should it be allowed?

Mr. MANN. I was calling it to the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I confess to the gentleman I had not thought about it in that light; and if the gentleman wants to except it, I am ready to accept his suggestion about it.

Mr. MANN. I would not be prepared, at a moment's notice, to prepare an amendment of that sort. When the Elkins antirebate law passed, I reported it to the House. I think it covers all that the gentleman's amendment does. This would cover municipal corporations in addition, in my opinion.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If this simply repeats the language of the Elkins antirebate law or the other laws that we have upon the statute books with reference to the violation of the interstate-commerce law and the Sherman antitrust law, we are here to-day codifying the laws, and it may be that the gentleman and his committee at some future day propose to bring before Congress a codification additional to what we have here; but if we are to judge by the slow progress which this bill has made through this House, that day is yet far off.

I call upon the Representatives of the House, by voting for this amendment, to let it be understood that the House, having an opportunity to vote on the question now, is of the opinion that there should be something more than a fine against the corporation for violation of these laws. I saw an article in the New York World yesterday which referred to the fact that since the beef-trust case was dismissed in Chicago by reason of what is known as the "immunity," obtained by reason of an interview with Mr. Garfield, who then represented the Government, the same acts have gone on, and while they might not be prosecuted for what occurred prior to the time for which they had made the disclosures to Mr. Garfield and thereby obtained immunity, yet they still continue violating the law in the same way; and we know that the price of the products in which they deal have increased enormously—to such an extent that a man of moderate means can hardly afford to buy a beefsteak or a dozen eggs or even a chicken that has been in cold storage. So that if Congress wants this criminal law codified the attention of the public should be called to the fact that not merely the corporation and the stockholders shall be fined and regulated by the judgment of the court, but that the officers of the corporation who violate the law shall receive the heavy hand of punishment and be put in the penitentiary if they violate this law. Put into the criminal law this section which makes it a violation, points out along with other criminal laws that we enact, and let it be understood that not only the corporation, but the officers of the corporation who violate the law will be prosecuted and fined and put in the penitentiary. This provision is contained in this part of the amendment:

Any person or corporation who shall offer, grant, or receive any such rebate shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by fine—

And so forth.

Now, the proviso provides that an officer of the corporation who engaged in it shall be prosecuted and punished. It is in order to reach these men who violate the law and not merely the inanimate body of the corporation which has no soul, and mulcting the innocent stockholders.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment solely on the ground that all of its provisions are at the present moment existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Is not most everything in this bill which you have enumerated existing law, except where you have amended it or added to it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Except where we have changed it by this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Have you left anything out of the bill because of the fact that it is existing law? Are not all the laws on the subject of peonage, for instance, which we will come to soon, existing law?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not understand my statement. I mean that it does not belong here because the same provision is under its appropriate head, that is, section 4721.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And this bill does not provide any substitute or repeal of that section?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. No. If this bill is not passed, every evil that the gentleman complained of could be indicted and punished under existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Take the preceding section with reference to transportation of birds. If that were not put in here, could you not prosecute violators as well?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will understand that if the bill passes we propose then to repeal that existing law, but the section of the existing law which I speak of is under another title in another part of the existing law, the administrative feature of the antitrust bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. In other words, you want this to be called "a codification of the criminal law" when it is not a codification of all the criminal laws?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is exactly the truth, because of the fact already explained. I know the gentleman is a lawyer of such large experience that he would agree with me and would not dissent for a moment when he saw the absolute impossibility of lifting important penal provisions out of the administrative features of the bill and attempting to put them in here.

I want to say that I felt as the gentleman feels, and we spent a great deal of time endeavoring to accomplish that very thing, and found that it was impossible. I am in sympathy with all that the gentleman from Georgia has said, and I want to assure him that every word of his amendment is all in the codification under its appropriate head, and that every offense of which he complains can now be punished.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not doubt the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as to whether it would not be desirable to have this law all in such shape that it could be printed by itself, so that people could have access to it, the point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that in preparing the codification of different portions of the statute they have not put them in the criminal code, or any code, but they put it in the codification of the law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Law of administration and procedure.

Mr. MANN. I think not; but the ordinary administrative law. Now, to take out this particular section and put it in the criminal code would involve either keeping it in two places in the statute or else leaving it out of the very place where it ought to be.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This does not take it out.

Mr. MANN. This will not take it out, but would the gentleman have us codify the law by putting the same provision in two different places in the law where even the omission of a comma might make it different?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I do not want to do anything that will hinder the enforcement of the law, and I do not think I am doing it. I want to do something that will accelerate the enforcement of this law, and especially the enforcement of the law against the real violators of the law, the individuals, rather than the corporations.

Mr. MANN. Oh well, I do not think the gentleman's amendment goes any further than existing law, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think it does.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand that it does.

Mr. COCKRAN. As I understand it, the point at issue between the committee and the gentleman from Georgia is this: The gentleman from Georgia proposes practically to reenact in this codification a provision of law that is already a feature of the Elkins Act, and the committee objects to legislating twice on the same subject.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. That is not the difficulty. There would be no objection to putting the amendment of the gentleman into this act, if this was the last of the codification work, but the Committee on Revision of the Laws is codifying the rest of the laws, and desires to put in the Elkins Act as amended by the Hepburn Act, prohibiting the granting of rebates and providing imprisonment and fine for violation of the law, in its proper place, along with the law relating to interstate commerce, where one would naturally look for it.

Mr. COCKRAN. That is precisely what I say, and the committee in charge of this bill objects to having the same law practically enacted in two places.

Mr. MANN. In two places.

Mr. COCKRAN. Where, if it be reenacted in precisely the same terms, it could not do any good and if different words be employed to express the same thing the result might be difficulty, confusion, and doubt.

Mr. MANN. That is it.

Mr. COCKRAN. I agree with the committee.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I desire to say, and I think it ought to be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia) there were—ayes 17, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOON], to the language of section 241, which reads as follows:

Any obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, letter, writing, print, or other matter of indecent character, or any drug, medicine, article, or thing designed, adapted, or intended for preventing conception, or producing abortion, or for any indecent or immoral use.

I venture to suggest that the language here employed is very sweeping. My objection is to these words, "or for any indecent or immoral use," without defining what would constitute any indecent or immoral use. These expressions are very elastic, and it seems to me it is not fair or proper to throw upon either a court or a jury the burden of defining or deciding just what kind of article would fall under this description. It seems to me it is the duty of this body when it undertakes to create a crime to define it accurately and clearly, so that all men can understand precisely the conduct against which a penalty is denounced.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, respecting the elastic character of the word "indecent," I entirely agree with the gentleman, and the gentleman will probably remember that I made quite an argument on that point respecting another section. The thing that is intended to be kept out by this seems to be incapable of absolute, accurate definition——

Mr. MANN. With decent language.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes; with decent language. It applies to a class of rubber goods that are very largely imported from other countries for that particular purpose.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, that explains it. If there be any actual commerce in common and well-known articles of such character——

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. There is.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then the language of the section is probably sufficiently clear to describe them, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 266. Whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 140, section 266, line 11, amend by inserting between the words "whoever" and "holds" the following:
"Under color of any law, statute, ordnance, regulation, or custom."

Mr. BRANTLEY. Mr. Chairman, section 266 of this bill is but a reenactment, with a slight change only in phraseology, of section 5526 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows:

Whoever holds, arrests, or returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any other manner aids in the arrest or return of any person or persons to a condition of peonage, shall upon conviction be punished, etc.

I propose to amend this section by inserting between the words "whoever" and "holds" the following language:

Under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom.

The practical effect of my amendment, should it be adopted, would be that in a prosecution under this section the Government, in addition to proving whatever acts might be necessary to constitute the crime charged, would also have to show that they were done under color of some law or custom of the State that permitted or sanctioned them. It is my opinion that the Government ought to be compelled to show this in order to have jurisdiction; and I further believe that my amendment is in the interest of correct legislation and tends to make the laws in the code uniform and consistent. The truth is that until the Supreme Court declared to the contrary I thought the peonage law was in the condition and had the meaning that my amendment seeks to give it. That I was justified in my belief is readily apparent by referring to section 1 of the peonage act of 1867. This first section now makes two widely separated sections in the Revised Statutes, to wit, sections 1990 and 5526. The first part of this section 1 in the act of 1867 makes section 1990 of the Revised Statutes, to wit:

That the holding of any person to service or labor under the system known as peonage is hereby declared to be unlawful and forever prohibited in the Territory of New Mexico, or in any other Territory or State of the United States, and all acts, laws, resolutions, orders, regulations, or usages of the Territory of New Mexico, or of any other Territory or State of the United States which have heretofore established, maintained, or enforced, or by virtue of which any attempt shall hereafter be made to establish, maintain, or enforce, directly or indirectly, the voluntary or involuntary service or labor of any persons as peons, in liquidation of any debt or obligation, or otherwise, be, and the same are hereby, declared null and void.

The remainder of this first section of the act, omitting the first word "and," now constitutes section 5526 of the Revised Statutes which we now have before us, to wit:

And any person or persons who shall hold, arrest, or return, or cause to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any other manner aids in the arrest or return of any person or persons to a condition of peonage, shall upon conviction be punished, etc.

It seems to me perfectly plain that unless section 1990 is read in connection with section 5526 we can not know the meaning of "a condition of peonage," as the expression is used in the latter section. Section 1990 seems now to be entirely lost, and we are asked to reenact section 5526, which prescribes heavy penalties for an offense that is wholly undefined. The purpose of my amendment is to make section 5526 mean what the act of 1867 said it meant, and to have it prohibit only, as the act of 1867 in my judgment prohibited only, the holding, arresting, or returning to a condition of peonage under color of some law, statute, or custom.

I have had occasion heretofore to go very thoroughly into the history of the peonage act of 1867, but I will trouble the House to-day with but a brief statement of this history. The act was aimed primarily at the system of peonage then existing in the Territory of New Mexico, which was a system established and maintained by law. The title of the act of 1867 shows this to be true, to wit:

An act to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States.

Section 2 of the act, which says—

It shall be the duty of all persons in the military or civil service in the Territory of New Mexico to aid in the enforcement of the foregoing section—further shows it. In addition to this, Senator Wilson, the author of the act, said on the floor of the Senate, in discussing peonage:

It exists in New Mexico at this time, the only part of the country where I know it does exist.

In the Territory of New Mexico, by enactments of the legislature in 1851, 1853, and 1859, there was established a complete code of laws defining and regulating a system of peonage. Under these laws contracts for personal service were sanctioned and remedies for their enforcement were provided. These laws permitted the sheriff, in certain cases where there was difficulty in compelling a specific performance, to contract to the highest bidder the services of the peon until the debt for which he had obligated his services had been discharged. The congressional act of 1867 specifically referred to this system of peonage and annulled the laws and customs creating and permitting it. The Congress at that time, as the debates show, had definite and precise information on which it was acting and had a fixed and definite purpose in view. It seems to me that any fair reading of the act of 1867 shows that it was aimed only at a condition created, sanctioned, or permitted by law or legal authority of some kind, and now that all of this congressional act of 1867 seems to be lost or abandoned, save that part that is now before us for amendment, I seek to amend it so as to place in it what, in my opinion, the act of 1867 said and intended should be in it. I think this ought to be done, not only to save the meaning and purpose of the act of 1867, but also that this section shall be in harmony with all our other laws, and so that the jurisdiction of the United States shall not infringe upon the jurisdiction that is sovereign to the State. The protection of personal liberty is the highest duty devolving upon the State, and this has been so from the foundation of our Government. A mere trespass by one individual upon the liberty of another individual does not, under any theory of our Government that I have ever heard advanced, give jurisdiction to the United States to punish, but such trespass, it seems to me, has ever been and ever must be punished solely by the State. I propose by my amendment simply that this foundation principle of our Government shall be maintained. In other words, for an individual and lawless trespass upon personal liberty, let the State punish just as it punishes for such a trespass upon property or life.

The protection of liberty is no more sacred than the protection of life, and the power of the United States is no greater to protect one than it is to protect the other. It is far from my purpose to object to the peonage statute or to defend or indorse peonage or trespasses of any kind upon human liberty. Should any State be derelict in its duty and permit by law, statute, or custom a system or condition of peonage to exist, then the United States Government has the power and owes the duty to step in and give the protection to liberty that the State has denied. I do maintain, however, that until the State fails in its duty the United States Government has no jurisdiction to interfere. Section 5526 as it now reads, dissociated as it is from the remainder of the law of which it is a part, and as it has been construed, seemingly permits the interference of the United States Government in cases of individual and lawless trespasses of liberty, although such trespasses may be in direct violation of the law of the State where committed. My amendment seeks to correct this and is in the interest of the elementary and fundamental principles of state sovereignty. The only authority for the United States Government to interfere at all in these matters is given by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, which reads:

Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

This language is broad; and accepting as correct the construction of the Supreme Court that—by its own unaided force and effect it abolished slavery and established universal freedom—

it still remains that it abolished certain specifically named things, to wit, "slavery" and "involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime." What is "slavery?" Mr. Justice Bradley, in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S.), said:

Slavery can not exist without law any more than property in lands and goods can exist without law.

What is "involuntary servitude?" Mr. Justice Miller, in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wallace), says:

The exception of servitude as a punishment for crime gives an idea of the class of servitude that is meant.

He was discussing the thirteenth amendment, and the intimation is clear and pointed that the class of servitude inhibited and abolished is that class established or recognized by Government. Judge Cooley, in his "Principles of Constitutional Law," page 237, says:

The word "slavery" in this country has acquired a somewhat technical meaning and is limited to that sort of servitude which has prevailed under the state laws, namely, to servitude for life. The prohibition of slavery might therefore seem to be limited to this sort of service, leaving the legislative authorities to establish a compulsory service for terms of years at discretion. Indeed, such servitude had existed in the early history of the country in cases of immigrants, known as "redemptioners," and of some others, and it would be easy to suggest exceptional cases in which excuses might exist to enact laws for compulsory service were the Legislature so disposed. It was deemed important, therefore, that the prohibition should include not slavery merely, but all classes of involuntary servitude not imposed as a punishment.

Mr. Solicitor-General Phillips, who appeared for the Government in the Civil Rights cases, stated in his brief (109 U. S., 7) that the expression "involuntary servitude," as used in the thirteenth amendment, does not cover "mere scattered trespasses against liberty committed by private persons." There are many other authorities that I could add to these, but I have quoted enough, it seems to me, to demonstrate that the authority of the United States under the thirteenth amendment to prevent and punish peonage is limited to restraints of liberty imposed, sanctioned, or permitted under some form of law, and does not extend to the prohibition or punishment of the mere lawless acts of individuals. These authorities support, if any support be needed, the construction I have given the plain language of the act of 1867.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. PARSONS. Was there not some case in Georgia where this question was decided?

Mr. BRANTLEY. There was a case in Florida that went to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. What were the facts in that case?

Mr. BRANTLEY. The case was that of Clyatt v. The United States, and the Supreme Court reversed the conviction that was had, upon the ground that it was not authorized by the evidence.

Mr. PARSONS. Was not the section of the Revised Statutes, in the language in which it appears in this bill, construed in that case?

Mr. BRANTLEY. It was.

Mr. PARSONS. Was not the language as now in the bill construed by the Supreme Court?

Mr. BRANTLEY. It was; and if the court had held the view that I am presenting, the amendment I have offered would not be necessary. I am stating my contention as to what the law should be, and not only what it should be, but what I think the act of 1867 intended it to be. The shape in which the peonage law now appears in this bill I do not think can be defended, for it is here proposed to inflict a serious punishment for an offense wholly undefined. It is here proposed to punish for returning a person to a condition of peonage without defining what shall constitute such a condition.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the Supreme Court, in the decision to which reference has been made, defined exactly what peonage is, and did they not say that the effect of it was a deprivation of liberty based upon a preexisting indebtedness, and that the indebtedness must exist or there could be no such condition as peonage under the section? Therefore, is it not true that peonage has received a judicial construction?

Mr. BRANTLEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will carefully read the opinion of the court, he will be "up in the air" as to what constitutes a "condition" of peonage. The decision does undertake a definition of peonage, but not of a condition of peonage. It is true that my amendment would never have been offered but for this decision. The fact, however, that the court has held that the law as it now reads means one thing is no argument against Congress changing the law so that it shall mean another thing.

The court has not undertaken to say what the law should be, but only what it is. The court in this case gave a very broad definition of the power of Congress under the thirteenth amendment, but that is not at all persuasive to me on the proposition that Congress should exercise this power. If the decision goes as far as some gentlemen think it does, it is the most far-reaching decision that the court has ever delivered, and practically wipes out the sovereignty of the State for the protection of liberty. The court was dealing with peonage under the thirteenth amendment, and said:

> We have no doubt of the validity of this legislation or its application to the case of any person holding another in a condition of peonage; and this, whether there be a municipal ordinance or state law sanctioning such holding.

The court also said of peonage:

> The basal fact is indebtedness. (197 U. S., 207.)

The important question that concerns me in this opinion relates to the power of Congress that is apparently enlarged and extended beyond anything that I have ever imagined could be done. I do not say that it does so extend it except as to peonage. I say it apparently so extends it, but I confess that I do not know what it does. To my mind there is nothing about a debt that can give jurisdiction to Congress. I can see no distinction, so far as the power of Congress is concerned, between the mere lawless act of an individual who restrains another of his liberty or forcibly and unlawfully compels him to labor because of a debt and any other case where the same things are done because of a desire for revenge or for any other cause. The crime consists in the trespass upon the liberty of the person restrained and not in the motive or purpose of the trespass. If Congress, under the thirteenth amendment, has the power to punish the lawless act of an individual who restrains another of his liberty on account of a debt, why has not Congress equal power under this amendment to enact laws against false imprisonment and against restraints of liberty of all kinds?

I have always believed, Mr. Chairman, that the true rule in these matters has never been clearer or more forcibly stated than in the opinion handed down by Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in the Cruikshank case (92 U. S., 553). He said:

> The rights of life and personal liberty are the natural rights of man. "To secure these rights," says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."
> The very highest duty of the States when they entered into the Union, under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "inalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator."
> Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to imprison falsely or for murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

This rule was again clearly stated by Mr. Justice Lamar while sitting in the circuit court in the case of United States v. Sanges (48 Fed. Rep., 78, 83, 84). After reviewing the various decisions of the Supreme Court on the war amendments, he said:

> They all agree that, aside from the extinction of slavery and the declaration of national citizenship, the constitutional amendments are restrictive upon the power of the General Government and the action of the States, and that there is nothing in their language or spirit which indicates that they are to be enforced by congressional enactments authorizing the trial, conviction, and punishment of individuals for individual invasions of individual rights, unless committed under state authority.

Again, Mr. Justice Wood, sitting in the circuit court, in the case of Legrand v. The United States (12 Fed. Rep., 577), said:

> Where a State has been guilty of no violation of the provisions of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States, no power is conferred on Congress to punish private individuals who, acting without any authority from the State, and, it may be, in defiance of law, invade the rights of the citizen which are protected by such amendments.

Further authorities almost without number could be cited in support of the rule which the cases cited sustain.

But, Mr. Chairman, independently of all these authorities, and considering only the language of the statute in question and the construction given it in the Clyatt case, does it follow, as the questions of the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania seem to imply, that because the court has given a definition of peonage Congress should not do so? Are we going to enact a statute under which the offense therein prohibited will not be known until the courts define it? Should not every man, under the letter of the law, be able to know when he is committing a crime? It is my understanding that any legislation which leaves open the door for the courts to come in and say who shall be punished and who shall not be punished is bad legislation. The Supreme Court in the Reese case (92 U. S., 214–256) said:

> Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime.

They also said:

> It would certainly be dangerous if the Legislature could set a net large enough to catch all possible offenders, and leave it to the courts to step inside and say who could be rightfully detained and who should be set at large. This would, to some extent, substitute the judicial for the legislative department of the Government.

In one of the very early cases (5 Wheat., 95) Mr. Chief Justice Marshall said:

> It is the Legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime and ordain its punishment.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the statute now before us, as it is proposed to reenact it, not only does not define the offense that it prohibits, but that this offense is not defined anywhere. A "condition" of peonage, if we reenact this statute as a thing separate and apart from the act of 1867 that defined peonage, will be anything that the courts may decide to make it. The courts will say who may be held and who may be discharged, and the judicial department of the Government will clearly be substituted for the legislative. The amendment that I have proposed will, if adopted, make it certain that no person can be convicted of returning another to a condition of peonage, unless it appears that such return was under color of some law, statute, or regulation.

The law will then be such that there will be left to the States, as it should be left, to punish those who violate the laws of the States, and at the same time will guarantee to everyone that if his State does not protect him in his liberty as against being held or returned to a condition of peonage, the United States Government will do so.

I have taken the language of my amendment bodily from section 13, page 21, of this bill. It is the language used by the framers of this bill in the section providing protection against a deprivation of the rights and privileges secured by the Constitution. I propose to use this language here, so that this section will be harmonious with those that precede it.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BRANTLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I have not read your amendment very carefully, but it seems to me that it will make a man guilty of a crime who acts upon a statute placed upon the books of his own State in good faith. When his State permits him to violate this law he is nevertheless guilty of a crime, although he may have acted in good faith on his own state statute. If that is what it means, I am against your amendment.

Mr. BRANTLEY. The gentleman misapprehends my amendment entirely. It does not add to the possibilities of a conviction, but it will require the Government to prove, in addition to all that must now be proved, the further fact that the act committed was permitted or sanctioned by the State. Whatever a condition of peonage may be, the gentleman's constituents are all subject to prosecution and punishment now, if they return or hold or arrest anybody to it. The status in these regards is not changed in the slightest by my amendment, but on the contrary the amendment puts an additional burden on the Government, and I think it ought to be there. I apprehend the gentleman does not suppose that if, in violation of the thirteenth amendment and the laws of Congress, his State should enact peonage or slavery laws, this action of his State would be the slightest protection to any man who proceeded to deprive a person of his liberty under such laws.

Mr. Chairman, in further support of my amendment, I would call attention to the fact that the first congressional interpretation of the thirteenth amendment was in the passage of the civil rights law that I referred to a moment ago as being section 13 of this bill. This law was first passed in 1867 under the thirteenth amendment, for the fourteenth amendment had not then been adopted. Subsequently, as is well known, the law was reenacted under the fourteenth amendment, but as originally enacted and as it now reads it contains the words "under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom," thus showing that the congressional idea of the thirteenth amendment in the year 1867, the year the peonage law was enacted, was that Congress had no jurisdiction over the lawless acts of individuals against other individuals, and that Congress in passing the peonage law did not intend to so declare.

Prior to the decision of the court in the Clyatt case, the only language of the court that would even seemingly justify Congress in legislating against the lawless acts of individuals appears in the decision in the civil rights cases (109 U. S., 23), as follows:

Under the thirteenth amendment the legislation, so far as necessary or proper to eradicate all forms and incidents of slavery and involuntary servitude, may be direct and primary, operating upon the acts of individuals whether sanctioned by state legislation or not.

If this language is authority for holding that Congress has power to punish the lawless act of an individual who holds another to personal service for a debt because the holding to personal service for a debt is an "incident" of peonage, is not it equally an authority for holding that Congress has the power to punish for an assault and battery by one individual upon another, because corporal punishment was an "incident" of slavery? Such a construction, it seems to me, opens the door wide for Congress to supersede the State in the protection of liberty, the always chiefest and highest duty of the State.

I apprehend and believe that the language quoted is susceptible of no such meaning, for "slavery" and "involuntary servitude," as I have already shown, are creations of the law. Personal service, lawlessly exacted by one individual from another, is in a class of servitude wholly unrelated to the servitude prohibited by the thirteenth amendment, and is neither a "form" nor an "incident" of the latter.

Mr. Chairman, from the days of the confederation up to the ratification of the thirteenth amendment no one anywhere or at any time ever questioned the sovereignty of the State to protect the citizen in his life, liberty, and property. Sovereignty for this purpose was never yielded to the Federal Government, and is not in it now; it resides in the State alone. The thirteenth amendment did not create a new kind of liberty; it created a new class of citizens. Neither the sovereignty nor the duty of the State to protect liberty was changed by this amendment, but this sovereignty and duty were extended to more people. The thirteenth amendment is the pledge of the United States that the States will exercise their sovereignty and perform their duty in these regards. Sovereignty for the protection of liberty, of life, nor of property can reside at the same time in two governments. The Supreme Court so declared in 92 United States, 550. Sovereignty for this protection was in the beginning and is now in the State. It is as much the duty of the Congress as it is of the courts to preserve the Constitution, and it is solely the duty of the legislative department to define what shall constitute a crime. My amendment seeks to preserve the separate jurisdictions of the State and the Federal Government. It also seeks to have Congress perform its duty of defining crime. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment because this particular section of law is being used for a very wholesome and necessary purpose, for the prevention of the return of people into peonage in certain sections of the country, and, in my judgment, it has received very careful consideration and construction by the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe that any attempted alteration, even for the purpose of making the law clearer, is a mistake, because the law in its present form has been so carefully considered. It is the existing law. It is being used by the Department of Justice, and I ask that the amendment be defeated.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, in line 15, page 140, after the word "both;"
"Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not be held to apply to any case of arresting, holding, or returning to custody any person under or by virtue of any judicial process."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, as this section reads it says:

Whoever holds, arrests, returns, or causes to be held, arrested, or returned, or in any manner aids in the arrest or return of any person to a condition of peonage, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

The word "arrest" there clearly indicates that should a person be arrested—that is, taken into custody by legal process—the provisions of the section would apply. In perhaps all the States of the Union—I know in most of the States of the Union—provisions are made for the arrest of persons where they are required to be held in custody until certain conditions provided in the law are complied with or, in default, to perform involuntary service. We find in the municipalities that those who are taken into custody are required to work upon the public streets. In most of the counties in the United States they are required to work upon the public roads, and in the States are required to work in the penitentiaries. This section has been construed by the courts to mean that if they should be forced into involuntary servitude, even if they were arrested under legal process, that that would be a violation of this statute; and that provision intimidates the constables, the justices of the peace, the judges of the courts, and the various officers who have in charge the laws which are in force in the various States with reference to requiring persons to work out their sentences when they are under arrest. We have had much trouble with this section in our immediate vicinity.

The penal laws there require that when a person has violated a labor contract he shall be subjected to a fine, and if he does not pay the fine then he shall work it out upon the public roads or streets. It has been held by the United States district courts that that was a violation of the statute in case of labor contracts.

These statutes providing for labor contracts are most wholesome, and they enable laborers in a great many instances to procure supplies, to procure advances upon their labor which they otherwise could not procure. The statutes usually provide that if a laborer goes upon a piece of work, particularly a plantation, for a stipulated period, say for one year, and obtains an advance either in certain supplies or money, and leaves his employment without repaying or tendering the amount which has been advanced to him, he shall be required to pay a fine; or in default of the payment of the fine, to suffer imprisonment in the parish jail and to work upon the public roads.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that these advances are made only for transportation, to enable a contractor to get these laborers to the place of their employment?

Mr. WATKINS. That is not the rule at all. That is an exception to the rule. In most of the States they prohibit the enforcing by arrest of an agreement of that kind. I know that in the State of Louisiana, where I live, that is not the rule, but it is forbidden, the payment of railroad fare not being considered the advancing of supplies.

Mr. SABATH. But we have had such cases.

Mr. WATKINS. There may have been cases of that kind, but not in the State of Louisiana, so far as I know.

Mr. SABATH. And people have been prosecuted for these various offenses.

Mr. WATKINS. There have been a number of people prosecuted because they have obtained large sums of money to carry out a contract and then refused to carry out the contract after getting $400 or $500. They would violate their contract and then prevent their places from being supplied by other laborers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman state a single instance where any laboring man has secured such advances as the gentleman has stated, of $400 or $500, and then violated the contract?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; I know a number of them. It becomes necessary in answering the question to go into personalities. I presided over a court for more than twelve years, and I know of a number of cases where laborers received advances of more than $500, violated the contract after they had worked a short time, and then went to other employment. They also kept other men away from the employers who made the advances and prevented them from supplying their places with other laborers. I could designate the names of these parties, if necessary, but there were a number of cases.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Suppose an individual is fined for a violation of some state law and is unable to pay the fine or to secure it, and suppose under another statute of the State to which the gentleman has referred he is working the fine out on the highway, or some other place. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a case of that kind has been held to be in violation of this statute?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; where the party is charged with violating a labor contract. And, as I stated a while ago, the constables and the justices of the peace are intimidated from enforcing the state statute on account of this word "arrest" in section 266.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Are they intimidated for fear that if the person is under judgment or sentence of conviction, whichever you call it, and he is required under the statute to work out his fine at so much per day, are the constables and overseers working under these conditions intimidated for fear if they undertake to enforce the judgment or sentence of the state court they will be arrested for violating this statute?

Mr. WATKINS. That is precisely the proposition I submitted, when the arrests are for violating a labor contract.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does your law require when a man borrows $500 from a bank and fails to pay it back that he can then be fined and be compelled to work out the fine?

Mr. WATKINS. Not at all. It only applies to a labor contract. It enables him to go to the planter and get advances, which he could not otherwise get; and it is only that class of cases amenable to the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana is not a substitute, but an additional amendment. The first question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRANTLEY) there were 28 ayes and 34 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WATKINS) there were 15 ayes and 34 noes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. When committed upon any vessel registered, licensed, or enrolled under the laws of the United States, and being on a voyage upon the waters of any of the Great Lakes, namely: Lake Superior, Lake Michigan, Lake Huron, Lake St. Clair, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, or any of the waters connecting any of said lakes, or upon the River St. Lawrence where the same constitutes the international boundary line.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 143, line 7.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 269, page 143, line 7, after the period, insert the following: "The jurisdiction conferred by this paragraph of crimes committed upon any such vessel while within the limits of any State shall be concurrent with that of the courts of such State."

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is existing law, and it was an omission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases decided that the United States, in order to acquire jurisdiction, must have jurisdiction ceded to it by the state government. I am now referring to subdivision 3 of this section. I notice that in quoting this section it simply says "or any place purchased or otherwise acquired by the United States by consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be." Does the gentleman think that is broad enough to cover the question of jurisdiction?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I will say that it is. It has been so decided that the consent of the legislature for the purpose therein enumerated extends to the United States absolute legislative power and absolute jurisdiction, the State reserving only the right to serve process.

Mr. BARTLETT, of Georgia. I understand that; but the mere consent of the state legislature that the United States Government may occupy ground for building does not necessarily carry with it the ceding of jurisdiction to the United States over the territory. That has been the decision of the court.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. This relates only to places where the jurisdiction is ceded. The language is as follows: "When committed within or on any lands, reserved or acquired for the exclusive use of the United States," by the consent of the legislature. Therefore, the United States may acquire, as the gentleman has said, the right to build or to occupy, and in that respect it becomes only as an ordinary citizen. That is true, but the gentleman will observe here that these are the words:

Acquired for the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States * * * by consent of the legislature of the State.

Title so obtained by the United States conveys the exclusive jurisdiction over such places.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then the United States must also acquire it in order to get jurisdiction for the purposes named in the Constitution—for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes. Of course the language "other needful building" has been construed to mean very many things, a post-office and military buildings and other buildings.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The court held it did not apply to one of the Soldiers' Homes in one of the Western States, because jurisdiction had not been given exclusively to the United States.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is true in the Kansas case particularly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman will observe we refer only to exclusive jurisdiction in this section, and if the gentleman will observe the earlier part of it, he will find that is the language:

When committed within or on any lands reserved or acquired for the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and under the exclusive jurisdiction thereof, etc.

That is the language of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Another question in reference to the last subdivision. I notice the bill uses this language:

On any island, rock, or key containing deposits of guano, which may, at the discretion of the President, be considered as appertaining to the United States.

Does the word "island" refer solely to those islands that are found containing deposits of guano, or does it refer to all islands?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. "Containing deposits of guano."

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does the word "containing" qualify only the language "island, rock, or key?"

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We have adopted it in the language of existing law. That has been construed by the Supreme Court, and we have not changed it at all. It is existing law and has received thorough judicial construction.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. That decision with reference to the Navasso Island, as I now recall it, did not use the language "appertaining to the United States," did it? It is left here at the discretion of the President of the United States to determine whether or not the island is within the jurisdiction of the United States. Does the present law leave it in the discretion of the United States to determine that?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Some Presidents might want to go out over the world hunting up islands to grab and make a part of land appertaining to the United States, and I hope we may have one some of these days who will want to get rid of some of those we have already, even though they contain no deposits of guano.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does the gentleman think that is definite enough, to leave it for the President to determine what is the territory of the United States where criminal jurisdiction shall be exercised by the court?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, it has been held to apply only to an island, rock, or key containing deposits of guano, and the existing law, which I will read to the gentleman, is section 5570:

Whenever any citizen of the United States discovers a deposit of guano on any island, rock, or key, not within the lawful jurisdiction of any other government, and not occupied by the citizens of any other government, and takes peaceable possession thereof, and occupies the same, such island, rock, or key, may, at the discretion of the President, be considered as appertaining to the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I thought the gentleman might think best to at least make it more definite than the present statute. We are trying not only to codify the law, but to make the law more definite.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It has been construed by the United States court, and the gentleman knows and, I think, will agree with me that that is of more importance than definite legislative language.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 272. Every person guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death. Every person guilty of murder in the second degree shall be imprisoned not less than ten years and may be imprisoned for life. Every person guilty of voluntary manslaughter shall be imprisoned not more than ten years. Every person guilty of involuntary manslaughter shall be imprisoned not more than three years.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this penalty for murder in the first degree does not change existing law, in that existing law provides, upon the recommendation of the jury trying the issue, the imprisonment may be for life. I would ask why the gentleman has not provided for that.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We have in the special provisions that come at the end of this code. We have preserved exactly existing law. The existing law in the section itself provides that the penalty shall be death. Then there is a special law reducing the penalty when the jury shall recommend to imprisonment for life.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Passed in 1898.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. And we have carried the provision, and it will appear under the general provisions of section 327.

In all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, or rape, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment."

Just in the language of existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It occurred to me it would have been very well to have put it in this particular place.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We have it just as the law now stands in that respect.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me a question? I find that the fine which is provided in the old statute is entirely left out in the case of manslaughter. It has occurred to me that very often in cases of involuntary manslaughter a fine is a useful sort of punishment. Now, the old law provided that punishment for manslaughter "shall be imprisonment with or without hard labor for not more than thirteen years and by a fine of not more than $1,000, except as otherwise provided by law," and it seems to me that that provision which allows the judge to impose a fine in case of manslaughter by carelessness ought to be retained.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, there may be considerable force in what the gentleman from New Jersey says upon that point. I can only say now that the committee gave it careful consideration, and the result of their deliberations is the bill as it is reported.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting the words "or be fined not exceeding $1,000" after line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 17 the words "or be fined not exceeding $1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I would ask the gentleman whether that is the language of the present statute or whether the present statute is not "and by a fine?"

Mr. PARKER. The present statute covers both voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. A part of the last section covers only involuntary manslaughter—that is to say, where death results from carelessness—and in such case I think the judge ought to be allowed to impose a fine. There are many cases of manslaughter where there is very little carelessness, and certainly no moral obliquity which should necessitate a punishment by imprisonment.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, but I think——

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman ought not the words "or both" be added?

Mr. PARKER. Yes; I think the words "or both" should be added at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PARKER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the question now is on agreeing to the amendment as modified by unanimous consent.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 275. Whoever shall commit the crime of rape shall suffer death.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I would like to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 275 by adding after the word "commit" the words "or attempt to commit."

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that is simply to provide the death penalty for attempt to commit rape. The gentleman understands, and all lawyers here understand, the minute details into which it is necessary for the proof to descend in order to distinguish the substantive crime from the attempt.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We make it twenty years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I understand you make it twenty years; but here is the point, that it is necessary in the prosecution to determine by the proof whether it is the substantive offense or whether it is the attempt to commit the substantive offense.

That subjects the prosecutrix to the most cruel cross-examination that the ingenuity or wit of man can conjure up. It is frequently impossible to prove the substantive offense, and I think we all agree that the other ought to be punished with death.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Of course, as a matter of fact, we do not punish with death in the United States now, except the jury shall say so; that under the general provision, by the recommendation of the jury, it is commuted to imprisonment for life. Now we have made it, by section 273:

Whoever shall assault another with intent to commit murder or rape shall be imprisoned not more than twenty years.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. But that does not relieve the necessity of going into these details of proof, and it occurs to me that the prosecutors ought to be relieved of that necessity.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would the gentleman from Mississippi hang a man without proof that would show beyond question that the crime had been committed?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Oh, of course not; but the gentleman, being a lawyer, understands to what detail the proof must descend to distinguish the crime from the attempt.

Mr. MACON. Would you not have to prove the attempt?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The attempt is made. Then the attempt is the substantive offense, and you must make that proof.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand; but where are you going to stop with the attempt?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The attempt has to be proved, of course.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But to what degree?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Beyond a reasonable doubt; but not to go into the minute details—I will say the abominable details, the disgusting details—that it is necessary for the proof to descend to in order to determine whether the substantive offense or the attempt has been committed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But when you are going to hang a man, you have to prove every ingredient of the crime?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly; and before you send a man to the penitentiary you have to prove every element of the crime of which he is charged, and in order to make that proof you have got to make it to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt. This amendment only affects the character of the proof.

Mr. MACON. I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he thinks it proper to visit the same punishment for the attempt to do a thing that is administered for doing the thing itself?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. For the attempt to do this thing.

Mr. MACON. As if it was done?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. For this thing.

Mr. MACON. Make no distinction in this kind of offenses?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I say the punishment should be the same.

Mr. MACON. Murder is a heinous crime.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. And is not this crime?

Mr. MACON. You make a distinction between this and other crimes?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. I make a distinction between this and every other crime.

Mr. MACON. Does not the gentleman think that if he were to try to impose a death penalty upon every person, I do not care whether white or black, who attempts to do a thing of that kind, that many of them who attempted to commit crime would be turned loose because the jury would not visit the death penalty upon them?

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. No.

Mr. MACON. I believe that many of them would be turned loose for the crime of attempt, because the jury would not want to impose the death penalty for the attempt to commit the offense now under discussion when they would gladly convict if the punishment was confined to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of years. I therefore oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill some questions. Now, I notice that on the opposite page to this section 273 are the words "or other persons who upon the high seas," and so forth, "out of the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States," and "out of the jurisdiction of any particular State," and so forth. Now I wish to ask the gentleman why he follows that plan in many of these sections of omitting these particular words, omitting "the high seas" and omitting "maritime jurisdiction of the United States," "territories outside of the United States?" Does not the gentleman seek to substitute by the form of the statute that he is bringing in each one of these sections distinct features of the offense in the case of a State where the state laws apply? Now, I want to know why that radical change was made from the old law in the proposed law?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. There is no change whatever.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have just read the change in two sections.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not read what have been included in the jurisdictional clause in the beginning of this section that we put in here, and the reason for it is that in twenty odd sections 20 different classes of jurisdiction were defined.

Mr. CLAYTON. There are several prints of this bill, Senate report and House report, and I have not been able to get a copy of all. I have been trying to get a copy of this bill while this discussion has been going on, but I have been unable to get hold of the print the gentleman has been using. Now, if you will kindly refer me to the section.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In section 269 we define the jurisdiction under which all these crimes are committed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Two hundred and sixty-nine is it?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes; on page 298 of the report.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will say to the gentleman that I have not had time to examine it, but I assume now that the provision of law carries out the idea embraced in his statement, and I thank him very much for the statement.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We gave a good deal of consideration to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 278. When a person is convicted of a violation of the section last preceding, the court may, in its discretion, direct that the amount of the fine, when paid, be paid for the use of the female seduced, or her child, if she have any; but no conviction shall be had on the testimony of the female seduced without other evidence, nor unless the indictment is found within one year after the arrival of the vessel on which the offense was committed at the port of its destination.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. It seems to me that for a conviction for rape or for carnally or unlawfully knowing a female under the age of 16 years, as well as for seduction, the evidence of the woman alone should not be sufficient. The latter part of the section, which provides as to evidence and as to the limit of time, ought to apply to the last three sections preceding. I suggest that to the gentleman in charge of the bill. I do not care to offer a formal amendment on it.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I do not think that ought to be offered. This is a particular crime, where a girl is particularly under the care or influence or an officer of a vessel. The general principles of law apply.

Mr. PARKER. The statutes of some States provide that there shall be corroborative evidence in order to insure conviction.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That rule of evidence would apply in any State which had such a provision of its statute anyhow.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 281. Whoever, by force and violence, or by putting in fear, shall feloniously take from the person of another anything of value, shall be imprisoned not more than fifteen years.

Mr. KIMBALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "person," in line 14, the words "or presence." The section now reads as follows:

SEC. 281. Whoever, by force and violence, or by putting in fear, shall feloniously take from the person of another anything of value, shall be imprisoned not more than fifteen years.

That is a perfectly correct definition of the common-law offense of robbery.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. I think the amendment is a wise one, and on behalf of the committee I accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 147, after the word "person," insert the words "or presence."

Mr. KIMBALL. Of course, the federal courts have no common-law jurisdiction, and this, being a penal statute, would have to be construed strictly. Its terms could not be extended to apply in any other way than as the words of the law would indicate. Therefore, if my watch was lying here on my desk and a robber should appear, present a pistol, put me in fear, and make me give up my watch, he could not be convicted under this section, because the watch was not on my person. For that reason I offer the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 286. Whoever, within the territorial limits of any State, organized Territory, or District, but within or upon any of the places now existing or hereafter reserved or acquired, described in section 269 of this act, shall do or omit the doing of any act or thing which is not made penal by any law of Congress, but which if committed or omitted within the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or District in which such place is situated, by the laws thereof now in force would be penal, shall be deemed guilty of a like offense and be subject to a like punishment; and every such state, territorial, or district law shall, for the purposes of this section, continue in force, notwithstanding any subsequent repeal or amendment thereof by any such State, Territory, or District.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I understand this section is new law, and not a portion of any existing law.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It is practically section 5391 of the existing law, put into language, however, that covers some omissions that have been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to exist in section 5391.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. The section is printed in type which indicates that it is new.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. We changed the language, because so many decisions have been rendered against section 5391, each one limiting it a little, that we have employed broader language and endeavored to profit by the instruction given by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It is under language like this that it has been expected or believed that prosecutions against the New York World were to be inaugurated either in the District of Columbia or at the Military Academy reservation, or somewhere under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is section 5391, which this takes the place of.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. This section having been written before that case arose, of course the gentleman did not have his eye particularly on that case.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It does not change existing law. If they could do it under section 5391, they could do it under this. If they could not do it under section 5391, this section would not cover it.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. In other words, if this bill becomes a law, it would not give jurisdiction to any place which does not now have the jurisdiction under the law?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Absolutely not.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Or it would not enable a prosecution to be had where it could not be had without this law?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It does not change the law a particle in that respect.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out all after the word "punishment," in line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 149, section 286, strike out all after the word "punishment," in line 18.

Mr. GARRETT. This seems to be a statute which predicates a crime upon the statute of a State and Territory, and then provides that, notwithstanding the repeal of that statute by the State or Territory, that so far as the Federal Government is concerned it shall continue to be a crime.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let me say to the gentleman that unless you had such a proviso a statute might be repealed and another substituted for it, or the statute might be amended in an inconsequential way and yet, as a result, we would be without any federal law for such an offense.

Mr. GARRETT. Would not this law follow?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the Supreme Court has held that while it is within the power of Congress to adopt the law of a State at a given time, it is not within the power of Congress to adopt the law as it may change from time to time, and so, in order to have the state law apply, you must fix it at a certain time. If the statute relating to some offense is amended, the federal law would simply adopt the state law as it existed at the time the federal act was passed, and would not take in such an amendment. The courts have held that you can not take in such amendments.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the language in the first part of the section attempt to do just that thing?

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not; it undertakes at the time of the enactment of this law to make the state law the federal law, and that is at a time fixed, and it could not be made to change with the change in the state law.

Mr. GARRETT. Then the federal law will remain, no matter what the state law may be?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably; and we have many federal laws, based upon state laws, that have been repealed for many years, and this is simply modernizing them to the present time.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It has been held that while we may adopt a state law, we can not delegate to the State the right to make laws.

Mr. COX of Indiana. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Suppose the State has repealed a statute entirely; does the federal statute remain alive?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only other way would be to pass an entire penal code in the minutest detail for each and every offense. This form has been adopted since the early history of the Government looking to making the state laws federal laws in certain places.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Do I understand the gentleman that this would take it absolutely out of the power of a State to amend a statute?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no; it does not do anything of the kind. We do not interfere with the State's power at all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. But if the State amended a statute upon which a federal law was based, this provision keeps the old statute alive.

Mr. SHERLEY. So far as it relates to federal offenses, it has no effect on the State law.

Mr. HOUSTON. It keeps it alive in the condition it is at the time of the passage of this law. No subsequent repeal or amendment by a State can affect it at all, because Congress can not delegate that power to a State.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the judgment of the committee in the matter, and I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN, Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 311. If any male person cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be fined not more than $300, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 311.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 311, being lines 22, 23, and 24, on page 160.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that this section has some sort of precedent, growing up at a time when we were trying to legislate against polygamy, especially in Utah, when it was a Territory, but it performs no office now in our criminal code except it may be a bad one. The reason for its existence has passed, if any reason for it ever existed. No prosecution has ever been had in the United States under a statute of that character, I am informed. It is barbarous and immoral in its terms. We have provided in this bill against the crime of polygamy. Section 310 fully provides against that. Section 313 provides a punishment for adultery. Section 315 of the House bill provides for the crime of fornication. This is a provision that could have no possible application in the state of legislation in the United States now, polygamy having been prohibited everywhere by law, and it is prohibited in this very bill. This provision should go out. I can not freely discuss the section. I hope gentlemen will read section 311, and I would like to hear the chairman of the committee state what reason there is for keeping such a provision as that in the criminal law of the United States.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the query of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that this is a part of the original Edmunds Act. It applied to a condition then that existed particularly in one section of our country. We gave the subject of its repeal careful consideration, and we submitted it to the Senators from the State of Utah, and it was deemed by them, owing to the conditions existing there, best left in the law. I might say in addition to that that in the Hawaiian Islands his law has a very salutary effect in the prevention of this kind of offense.

Mr. KEIFER. How does it differ from the provisions in other parts of the bill, the sections I have referred to relating to polygamy, adultery, and fornication?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The Edmunds law was framed to meet almost every condition. There were a great many pretexts that were resorted to in certain sections to evade the existing law. This law was drawn with great care and particularity to meet every one of these conditions. This was one of the conditions covered, and it is felt now by people in those Territories wise to keep that law in effect. It can not do any harm, and it does provide against the commission of an offense that might not otherwise be punished.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that even in Utah, where it originally was intended to be applied, there never was a prosecution under it, and there never has been, so far as I know, since it was a part of that law, which was intended to apply to conditions that were supposed to be likely to arise under the old territorial polygamy law. This law now is made by express provision of the statute to apply to the District of Columbia, and there are no such polygamous conditions here that I know of. There are no conditions existing anywhere in the United States that are not covered by the sections of this bill which we have just passed over, or about to reach, and it is apparently intended to be authority for the commission of an illicit act, provided it is limited as it is stated in this section. The sole implication is in the direction of legalizing immorality. Therefore I think it is time that it was left out.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, reading from the print which I have of section 311, which is offered as the section under consideration, the language used in the old section provides:

That if any male person in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, etc.

Why was that language left out?

Mr. SHERLEY. That is covered by the general section 308, in the beginning of this chapter.

Mr. KEIFER. It applies to all the Territories and to the District of Columbia now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTHOLDT) there were—ayes 9, noes, 18.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 319. Whoever shall willfully and maliciously trespass upon or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive, with the intent to commit murder, robbery, or any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car, or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any such car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both. Whoever shall counsel, aid, abet, or assist in the perpetration of any of the offenses set forth in this section shall be deemed to be a principal therein. Upon the trial of any person charged with any offense set forth in this section it shall not be necessary to set forth or prove the particular person against whom it was intended to commit the offense, or that it was intended to commit such offense against any particular person.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whoever shall willfully and maliciously trespass upon or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive, with the intent to commit murder, or robbery, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than twenty years, or both. Whoever shall willfully and maliciously trespass upon or enter upon any railroad train, railroad car, or railroad locomotive with intent to commit any unlawful violence upon or against any passenger on said train or car, or upon or against any engineer, conductor, fireman, brakeman, or any officer or employee connected with said locomotive, train, or car, or upon or against any express messenger or mail agent on said train or in any car thereof, or to commit any crime or offense against any person or property thereon, shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both. Whoever shall counsel, aid, abet, or assist in the perpetration of any of the offenses set forth in this section shall be deemed to be a principal therein. Upon the trial of any person charged with any offense set forth in this section, it shall not be necessary to set forth or prove the particular person against whom it was intended to commit the offense, or that it was intended to commit such offense against any particular person.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the substitute is simply to separate minor offenses from the great ones of murder or robbery. As this section was originally reported by the committee it made possible a punishment of twenty years' imprisonment for the minor offenses, and it was believed that it was proper to separate the minor from the graver offenses and provide a less punishment for the minor ones, and that is the only change in the section.

Mr. KEIFER. May I ask the gentleman, what is the difference in the language the gentleman uses? I do not notice it in my bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. The only difference is this: As the act is now drawn it applies not only to willful and malicious trespass with the intent to commit a murder or robbery, but also any unlawful violence where the latter crime may be a very minor one; and instead of providing that the punishment in such case may be as great as twenty years in the penitentiary, as the section now provides, I have simply separated it and provided for twenty years in the penitentiary when the trespass is for the purpose of committing murder or robbery; and then when it is for these minor offenses, providing the maximum punishment of a year.

Mr. KEIFER. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to be separated precisely in the same way as the bill which I have.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will find in the bill he has the punishment that is permissible for any offense is twenty years.

Mr. KEIFER. No; it is divided as the gentleman says——

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the gentleman——

Mr. KEIFER. I have the Senate print here.

Mr. SHERLEY. The Senate print is exactly in accord with the amendment offered by myself.

Mr. KEIFER. Your proposition is the Senate section, with the words "or both" added.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the maximum penalty for assault with intent to murder for the purpose of robbery?

Mr. SHERLEY. Twenty years.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the maximum?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Anything less than that is in the discretion of the judge?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; we have no minimum punishment for any of these crimes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it is my judgment that any person who assaults another with intent to commit murder and for the purpose of robbery is a born murderer, and that to fix a minimum in the discretion of the judge is altogether wrong. I have in mind, if the gentleman will permit, an illustration in that line. I have mentioned it before in the House of Representatives. Some years ago I went to the city of Chicago, and while there I heard tried the murder case of Frank Mulkowski. That man, when 18 years of age, killed a man in Austria-Hungary for the purpose of robbery and was sentenced for life. After serving twenty-two years, he was pardoned upon the express condition that he leave that country. He came over here and went to board with a family by the name of Kliedziek, in Chicago. He had been in this country less than seven months when he killed the wife of the man in whose family he boarded in order to rob her of a few rings, as I remember, and a little purse. This shows not only a lax administration of our immigration laws, but it also shows the danger, on sentimental grounds or any other, of permitting a judge to sentence a criminal for only one year or two years or three years where he assaults another person with the intent to murder and to commit robbery.

Such a man is as dangerous at large as is a wild beast of prey. He has attempted murder, and the minimum punishment ought to be twenty years.

Mr. KEIFER. It is a capital punishment, and it was in that case.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I say that a man who assaults another for the purpose of robbery and does not succeed in murdering ought not to be punished with less than twenty years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 320. The manner of inflicting the punishment of death shall be by hanging.

Mr. KIMBALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that section by striking out the last word, which is the word "hanging," and insert in place of it "electrocution."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 165, line 4, strike out the word "hanging" and insert the word "electrocution."

Mr. KIMBALL. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States ought to take the lead in all progressive movements, whether dealing with the treatment of criminals or any other question looking to the improvement of existing conditions. The old-fashioned way of tying a criminal up by the neck, frequently choking him to death rather than breaking his neck, and often making a holiday and carnival occasion of the hanging, ought long since to have been done away with. In most of the States statutes have been enacted requiring executions to be private and restricting the number of persons who are permitted to be witnesses of the execution. That is an acknowledgment of the fact that public hangings are brutalizing and have a bad effect upon the community. New York, Ohio, New Jersey, and other progressive States have adopted electrocution as the mode of taking the life of persons convicted of capital offenses. No reasonable objection has ever been urged against electrocution, and no reasonable objection can be urged against it. It is a humane, decent, and practical way of taking the life of one who has forfeited it on account of crime. I trust that the House of Representatives will turn its face to the future and adopt this amendment and install a mode of executing criminals more in harmony with the age than the old-fashioned way of hanging.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by making it imprisonment for life, and abolishing capital punishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is providing for the method of inflicting the death penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts offer an amendment?

Mr. McCALL. I move to amend by striking out the section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What would be done with a man who was sentenced to death?

Mr. MANN. They would electrocute him.

Mr. McCALL. Then, I should move to abolish the penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, to perfect the text.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KIMBALL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers, as an amendment, to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McCALL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 326. The circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of South Dakota shall have jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine all actions and proceedings in which any person shall be charged with the crime of murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault with a dangerous weapon, arson, burglary, or larceny, committed within the limits of any Indian reservation in the State of South Dakota. Any person convicted of murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, or burglary, committed within the limits of any such reservation, shall be subject to the same punishment as is imposed upon persons committing said crimes within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That any Indian who shall commit the crime of rape within any such reservation shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court. Any person convicted of the crime of assault with intent to kill, assault with a dangerous weapon, or larceny, committed within the limits of any such reservation, shall be subject to the same punishment as is provided in cases of other persons convicted of any of said crimes under the laws of the State of South Dakota. This section is passed in pursuance of the cession of jurisdiction contained in chapter one hundred and six, Laws of South Dakota, 1901.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman about what seems to me to be an error. I find here we have provided in a prior section that whoever shall commit the crime of rape shall suffer death. Now, in this section and the one preceding it the provision is found that if any Indian shall commit the crime of rape he shall be imprisoned in the discretion of the court. I would like to know why the Indian should not be punished just as much as the white man. This is a discrimination against the white man.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. The laws of the United States as enacted by Congress, I will say, have always shown a more tender consideration for the rights of the Indians in this respect than for the white man.

Mr. PAYNE. What rights have the Indians in that respect? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the gentleman does not contend that this is a right of those Indians?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Well, I can not argue it here seriously; but it has always been considered that the crime of rape by an Indian upon an Indian girl was entitled to much more consideration than a similar crime against a white girl by a white man.

Mr. NORRIS. But, if the gentleman will pardon me, this does not provide for rape upon an Indian woman exclusively.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. It does in section 325. I am not quite sure about section 326.

Mr. NORRIS. In the provision I am looking at here it does not make any such distinction.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In section 326?

Mr. NORRIS. Rape may be committed by an Indian on a white woman.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. That is not right, and it ought not to be so.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, does the gentleman consent to an amendment?

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Undoubtedly; limiting it, as it is in section 325, to Indians committing certain crimes against the person or property of any other Indian.

Mr. NORRIS. As I read it in the copy that I have here, it does not say upon any Indian woman in either case.

Mr. MILLER. It says Indians or other persons.

Mr. NORRIS. It reads:

Provided, That any Indian who shall commit the crime of rape within any such reservation shall be imprisoned in the discretion of the court.

In the other proviso it also reads:

Provided, That any Indian who shall commit the offense of rape within the limits of any Indian reservation shall be imprisoned in the discretion of the court.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that both those provisions be amended by inserting, after the word "rape," the words "upon any Indian woman."

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. In behalf of the committee, I will accept that. It ought to be limited in that way undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to recur to section 325 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 166, line 23, after the word "rape," insert "upon any Indian woman."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WATKINS. I should like to inquire whether that does not leave the provision without any punishment at all for rape committed upon any other woman than an Indian woman?

Mr. NORRIS. The general law that we have passed will cover that.

Mr. WATKINS. It has been suggested to me that instead of the words "Indian woman" it should read "Indian female."

Mr. GARRETT. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to the first two lines of that section. I think he will find it includes the very thing he is seeking to get at. He will see there that it reads:

All Indians committing against the person or property of any Indian or other person any of the following crimes——

Mr. NORRIS. But this comes in as a proviso. If it were not a proviso, that might be true.

Mr. GARRETT. It relates, however, to what has been said.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Why not strike out the entire proviso?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment the gentleman from Tennessee speaks of is already agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am sitting so far away from where the gentlemen are carrying on their conversation or colloquy that I can not hear everything. I should like to know why the same penalty ought not to be inflicted for the crime of rape whether it be on an Indian woman, a negro woman, an Anglo-Saxon woman, or anybody else. Why should not an Indian committing that crime against any woman suffer death?

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the gentleman, but I think this is applied only to an Indian woman, because the committee have considered, and legislation on this subject generally has been with the idea that the morals of Indian women are not always as high as those of white women, and consequently the punishment should be lighter for an offense against her.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. The gentleman from Nebraska has been recognized to offer an amendment. He offered it, but it was not understood at the Clerk's desk. Will the gentleman state his amendment to section 326?

Mr. NORRIS. It is the same amendment, only it comes in at a different place.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does it come in?

Mr. NORRIS. It comes in after the word "rape," in line 13, page 167.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 13, page 167, after the word "rape," the words "upon any Indian woman."

Mr. PADGETT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Nebraska who offers the amendment, what interpretation he places upon the words "Indian woman?" How much Indian blood must there be? Suppose she is a half blood.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not want to say. I suppose she would be considered an Indian.

Mr. PADGETT. Suppose she was a woman of one-quarter Indian blood?

Mr. NORRIS. That would be still less Indian.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to know how much Indian blood in a woman would exempt a man from the penalty of death.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask that the section of the bill be read as it will read when amended. There are many in the House without copies of the bill, because they have all been exhausted, and we can not intelligently follow these amendments. I ask that the section may be read as it will read as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the section will be again read by the Clerk as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read the section.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I noticed that the Clerk read "Indian woman." I think I asked to have that modified by inserting the word "female" instead of "woman."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska as modified.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were 39 ayes and 13 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 327. In all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, or rape, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto, "without capital punishment;" and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid, the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I have here the Senate bill, so that I can not designate accurately the place where the amendment will come in, but I move to strike out the words in that section as follows:

The jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment;" and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid.

So that it will read:

In all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree, or rape, the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

The intention is to substitute imprisonment for life instead of the death penalty. While it may seem inconsistent with other parts of the bill, the committee will have an opportunity to correct the other parts if the amendment shall be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 327, after the word "rape," in the second line of the section, strike out all down to and including the word "aforesaid."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCALL) there were—ayes 21, noes 35.

Mr. McCALL. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the penal code and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 21926. An act for the organization of the Militia in the District of Columbia;

H. R. 25552. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania, by the Liberty Bridge Company," approved March 2, 1907;

H. R. 25805. An act to reenact and to amend sections 3646 and 3647 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 26216. An act to extend the provisions of section 4 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved August 18, 1894, to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona;

H. R. 16274. An act to amend section 10 of chapter 252, volume 29, of Public Statutes at Large;

H. R. 18487. An act for the relief of Charles H. Dunning; and

H. R. 19662. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace."

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HUBBARD of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. P. Hall, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. DENBY, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mrs. Elise Boedtcher, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks that I made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CLAYTON. And I move as a substitute that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is there any motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. There will be in a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman from Alabama to move that the House do now adjourn. That is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is quite correct about it.

Mr. WATSON. Previous to that I had moved that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. That was before the gentleman from Alabama moved to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There was a motion made by the gentleman from Indiana to recess, and afterwards the gentleman from Alabama moved to adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Last session we had a special rule that made the recess privileged over a motion to adjourn, but under the rules now a motion to adjourn takes precedence.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may be right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is impossible to tell whether a gentleman is right until the Speaker has the final say. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLAYTON) there were 22 ayes and 65 noes.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were 38 ayes and 8 noes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant-at-Arms will bring in absent Members; the question is on the motion that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 28, answered "present" 5, not voting 189, as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Council joint memorial 4. By Mr. Hanley.

Memorial asking the immediate admission of New Mexico into the Union as a State in compliance with the recent pledges of the two great political parties of the United States.

Your memorialists, the thirty-eighth legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, representing the united sentiment of the people of this Territory, as well as the sentiment of the people of the various States of the Union, as repeatedly expressed in party platforms of the two great political parties of the country, and especially in the two last national platforms of the Republican and Democratic parties of the United States, renew their demand for the admission of this Territory into the Union as a State.

We have now arrived at a point in our history when to further delay this much-desired boon to us would be to discriminate against us as American citizens without cause or excuse. Our population, our wealth, our great area, and our admirable system of public schools are so well and favorably known that it is hardly necessary to refer to them again, but lest all of our Senators and Representatives may not have kept our steady progress in mind, we, at the risk of repetition, submit a few facts for their consideration:

On the 1st day of January, 1909, our population was		400,000
Our gold production for the year was		$300,000
Our silver production was	ounces	500,000
Our copper production was	pounds	8,000,000
Our lead production was	tons	2,000
Our coal production was	do	2,500,000
Our iron production was	do	125,000

There are in this Territory 120 newspapers, 70 banks, 3,000 miles of railroad, 2,500,000 acres of land under cultivation, 400,000 acres under irrigation, 2,000,000 acres capable of irrigation, 13,000,000 acres capable of dry farming, 40,000,000 acres open for private entry. Our taxable property has a valuation of more than $250,000,000. For the last sixty years we have been contributing our money to the support of the General Government without any voice as to how the money thus contributed should be expended. The system of government under which we exist is not only unrepublican, but in its character is autocratic, and opens the door for many abuses. A territorial form of government is wholly incompatible with the interest of the people. It is intolerable to the average American citizen, and is only intended to endure for the brief time required to prepare for statehood. A procrastination of this right is not justified beyond the point of the inability of the people to support and maintain a state government.

To keep a Territory like New Mexico in territorial bondage when the necessity for so doing has long since ceased to exist, is an unpardonable wrong to over 400,000 people, whose record is that of unswerving loyalty and devotion to the General Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit a certified copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of National Representatives, to the members of the committees on Territories in both Houses of Congress, and to individual Members and to the Delegate in Congress from this Territory.

CHAS. A. SPIESS,
President of the Council.

WM. F. BROGAN,
Chief Clerk of the Council.

E. A. MIERA,
Speaker House of Representatives.

E. H. SALAZAR,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Approved this 10th day of February, A. D. 1909.

NATHAN JAFFA,
Acting Governor of the Territory of New Mexico.

Filed in office of secretary of New Mexico, February 11, 1909, 10.15 a. m.

NATHAN JAFFA, Secretary.

I, Nathan Jaffa, secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, do hereby certify that I have compared the foregoing copy of council joint memorial No. 4, passed by the thirty-eighth session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico and approved on February 10, A. D. 1909, with the enrolled and engrossed original now on file in this office, and declare it to be a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the Territory of New Mexico, at Santa Fe, the capital, this the 11th day of February, A. D. 1909.

[SEAL.]

NATHAN JAFFA,
Secretary of New Mexico.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a joint memorial of the legislature of Utah, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1. By Mr. Wilson.

Memorial asking an appropriation of 3,000,000 acres of arid land for building a state capital and the improvement of public roads of the State of Utah.

Memorial from the governor and legislature of the State of Utah to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the President of the United States, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The governor and the legislature of the State of Utah respectfully ask that there be donated to the State of Utah 3,000,000 acres of public lands, nonmineral and unallotted, arid and incapable of irrigation, within the State of Utah, to be sold by the State under such rules as Congress may prescribe, the proceeds to be applied equally to the improvement of the public roads of the State and the construction of a statehouse or capitol building for the State of Utah.

Your memorialists represent that the National Government now has within the State of Utah over 37,000,000 acres of public land subject to homestead entry.

Residence thereon while reclaiming can not reasonably be expected, and there is no law now in effect by which title to this land can be transferred to the State.

The cash proceeds of the sale of lands, as suggested in this memorial, will enable Utah to penetrate all sections of the State with good highways. The effect will be to open regions not now considered desirable, and much of the land not distinctly arid, but never likely to be taken up by settlers, will then become in immediate demand.

The mining interests of our State are among its most important assets. For fifty years prospectors have traversed its hills and mountains. Many prospects have been located and many abandoned mines await the advent of roads to mark their development. Supplementing the big highway, to be made possible by the present plan, will be the building of connecting and tributary roads leading to the main line, at the expense of our citizens.

Communication throughout the State will then be rendered easy and pleasant. Settlement, with the consequent appreciation in land values, will naturally follow. Farms feel the influence of good roads, and the fences, the buildings, and even the interior furnishings of the houses will improve with the improved outdoor means of travel.

Utah should have a statehouse. The material is in the State, and its use will vastly benefit every interest of our Commonwealth.

In States where swamp lands were found the Federal Government has ceded large tracts of these lands, and they have been advantageously disposed of for the good of the State and the good of the Nation.

By way of summary, we ask the Government for land not of present value to the Nation and capable under present conditions of becoming valuable. If the grant is made, the value of all the land remaining in government ownership will be greatly increased.

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be engrossed and forwarded, one each to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, to Senator REED SMOOT, Senator GEORGE SUTHERLAND, and Congressman JOSEPH HOWELL, with the request that Utah's congressional delegation use every legitimate effort to cause the provisions of this memorial to be enacted into law by the Congress of the United States.

HENRY GARDNER,
President of the Senate.
E. W. ROBINSON,
Speaker of the House.

Approved, February 11, 1909.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a memorial of the legislature of Utah, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1. By Mr. Wilson.

Memorial asking an appropriation of 3,000,000 acres of arid land for building a state capitol and the improvement of public roads of the State of Utah.

Memorial from the governor and legislature of the State of Utah to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives of the United States.

To the President of the United States, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The governor and the legislature of the State of Utah respectfully ask that there be donated to the State of Utah 3,000,000 acres of public lands, nonmineral and unallotted, arid and incapable of irrigation, within the State of Utah, to be sold by the State under such rules as Congress may prescribe, the proceeds to be applied equally to the improvement of the public roads of the State and the construction of a statehouse or capitol building for the State of Utah.

Your memorialists represent that the National Government now has within the State of Utah over 37,000,000 acres of public land, subject to homestead entry.

Residence thereon while reclaiming can not reasonably be expected, and there is no law now in effect by which title to this land can be transferred to the State.

The cash proceeds of the sale of lands, as suggested in this memorial, will enable Utah to penetrate all sections of the State with good highways. The effect will be to open regions not now considered desirable, and much of the land not distinctly arid, but never likely to be taken up by settlers, will then become in immediate demand.

The mining interests of our State are among its most important assets. For fifty years prospectors have traversed its hills and mountains. Many prospects have been located and many abandoned mines await the advent of roads to mark their development. Supplementing the big highway, to be made possible by the present plan, will be the building of connecting and tributary roads, leading to the main line, at the expense of our citizens.

Communication throughout the State will then be rendered easy and pleasant. Settlement with the consequent appreciation in land values will naturally follow. Farms feel the influence of good roads, and the fences, the buildings, and even interior furnishings of the houses will improve with the improved outdoor means of travel.

Utah should have a statehouse. The material is in the State, and its use will vastly benefit every interest of our Commonwealth.

In States where swamp lands were found the Federal Government has ceded large tracts of these lands, and they have been advantageously disposed of for the good of the State and the good of the Nation.

By way of summary, we ask the Government for land not of present value to the Nation, and incapable under present conditions of becoming valuable. If the grant is made the value of all the land remaining in government ownership will be greatly increased.

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be engrossed and forwarded, one each to the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, to Senator REED SMOOT, Senator GEORGE SUTHERLAND, and Congressman JOSEPH HOWELL, with the request that Utah's congressional delegation use every legitimate effort to cause the provisions of this memorial to be enacted into law by the Congress of the United States.

HENRY GARDNER,
President of the Senate.
E. W. ROBINSON,
Speaker of the House.

House joint memorial and petition 4. By Mr. Lincoln.

The legislature of the State of Oklahoma to the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the Deep Fork River, flowing through seven of the counties of the State of Oklahoma, is, on account of frequent overflows caused by its winding channel and the obstructions therein, a menace to the lives, health, and property of the people residing in and along the Deep Fork Valley; and

Whereas a movement is now on foot to straighten the channel of said river, thereby draining said valley, preventing said overflows, removing the menace to health and property, and reclaiming a vast area of the richest lands in the United States; and

Whereas a large per cent of said lands is now owned by full-blood Indians, wards of the Government, whose lands are nontaxable; and

Whereas the draining of Deep Fork River, as above, has been pronounced by competent surveyors and engineers as being practicable and feasible and would result in exempting the said valley from overflow: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Oklahoma (the senate concurring herein), That the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States be, and he hereby is, petitioned to authorize and cause the immediate survey of the Deep Fork River, to the end that the proper and necessary steps may at once be taken to straighten the channel of said river; and be it further

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIRCULAR No. 14.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, April 4, 1905.

The following report on a bill introduced and considered at the third session of the Fifty-eighth Congress is published for the information of officers of the Corps of Engineers in charge of river and harbor works, it being thought that the important legal propositions discussed, and a knowledge of the department's position regarding the subject-matter, may be of interest and value:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
January 17, 1905.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, inviting attention to the accompanying report of the Chief of Engineers, U. S. Army, of yesterday's date, and to drafts of bills therein referred to. The report seems to me to be very comprehensive, accurate, and instructive.

WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, January 16, 1905.

Hon. WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

SIR: 1. I have the honor to return herewith a letter, dated the 13th ultimo, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, inclosing for the views of the War Department thereon H. R. 16298, Fifty-eighth Congress, third session—

"A bill to provide for and regulate the use of the navigable rivers and streams of the United States for manufacturing, industrial, and other purposes by means of water power obtained therefrom."

2. There are two distinct propositions embraced in the bill, as follows:

(a) To authorize the Secretary of War to grant leases and licenses to private persons or corporations for the use of water power created by dams and other structures built by the Government on navigable waters for the benefit of navigation.

(b) To empower the Secretary of War to authorize private persons or corporations to construct dams and other structures, and to develop and use water power, at points on navigable rivers where the Government has not built such structures.

3. In connection with legislation of this kind careful consideration should be given to the question of the limitations of the power of the Federal Government over navigable waters. By virtue of its power to regulate commerce, Congress may exercise control over the navigable waters of the United States, but only to the extent necessary to protect, preserve, and improve free navigation. The Federal Government has no possessory title to the water flowing in navigable streams, nor to the land comprising their beds and shores, and hence Congress can grant no absolute authority to anyone to use and occupy such water and land for manufacturing and industrial purposes. The establishment, regulation, and control of manufacturing and industrial enterprises, as well as other matters pertaining to the comfort, convenience, and prosperity of the people, come within the powers of the States, and the Supreme Court of the United States holds that the authority of a State over navigable waters within its borders, and the shores and beds thereof, is plenary, subject only to such action as Congress may take in the execution of its powers under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the several States.

4. Many of the provisions of the bill under consideration appear to conflict with these principles of law, and particularly sections 3 and 6, which propose to confer upon the United States, and upon any lessee or grantee under the provisions of the bill, the power to condemn any land or other property bordering on or adjacent to the river or stream to be used. Eminent domain is the right to take property for public uses, and is inherent in the United States by virtue of its sovereignty. Private property can be expropriated by the Federal Government, however, for public purposes only—that is, when it is necessary for the use of the Government in the exercise of any of its legitimate powers. To take, or to authorize the taking of the property of one individual for the use and benefit of another in carrying on a private business or industry, as proposed by the bill, is not a proper exercise of the right of eminent domain. There may be certain enterprises of a quasi-public character, such as electric-light and railway companies, that would desire to avail themselves of the use of water power, and to which the right to condemn private property could properly be granted; but the granting of such right is believed to be a function of the States, inasmuch as the organization and incorporation of these enterprises, as well as the title and ownership of the property affected, are matters for state control and regulation. In view of the foregoing, I am unable to recommend favorable consideration of the bill in its present form.

5. To legislation authorizing the Secretary of War to lease water power created by works constructed by the Government, I see no special objection, but I know of no demand for it in the public interest.

The right of Congress to regulate, control, and dispose of such water power is believed to be unquestionable, inasmuch as the power constitutes a valuable property created at the public expense, and when utilized by private persons or corporations should be paid for. Whether a general policy of this kind should be adopted, however, is a question that should be very carefully considered. Locks and dams are built and operated for the purpose of facilitating navigation and commerce, and nothing should be permitted that would tend to impair their usefulness or interfere with their operation for this purpose. Partnerships or quasi partnerships between the Government and private persons or corporations have not been generally favored in the past, as experience has shown that they are apt to be attended by many annoying complications. I do not believe that sufficient revenue would be derived from renting water power to compensate for the trouble and inconvenience that might ensue from the adoption of such a policy. Congress has heretofore authorized the renting of land and water power at the locks and dams on the Muskingum River and Green and Barren rivers; but it is understood that this was done for the reason that at the time these works came into the possession of the United States there was in existence a number of leases granted by the former owners which constituted an easement on the property, some of which leases had many years to run. In cases where a new privilege is asked, it has been customary to invite public competition, setting a minimum price; but no active competition has been developed. There is also one company which uses land and water power at Lock No. 4 on the Kentucky River, under a lease granted by the State of Kentucky, which expires in 1977. During the past fiscal year there were in existence 27 different leases, and the total gross revenue received by the Government was only $4,500, and in a number of instances in the past the Government has been compelled to resort to suits against lessees to collect the rental. While many applications would be made for permission to use government water power, if no charge was made therefor, it is believed that few leases would be made, and then only at favored localities, if adequate compensation were exacted. In the river and harbor act of June 13, 1902, Congress authorized the leasing of water power at the locks and dams on the Cumberland River. Before the enactment of this law a number of persons appeared to be desirous of using water power in this river, but although the law has been in existence more than two years not a single lease has been applied for or granted. If, however, Congress should decide to adopt this policy, I beg to recommend that the legislation take the form of the accompanying draft of a bill which, in my opinion, is so drawn as amply to protect the interests of the Government.

6. Regarding the proposition to empower the Secretary of War to authorize the use and development of water power at localities not improved by the United States, it should be borne in mind that natural water power—that is, power made available by the existence of natural falls and rapids in a river—is appurtenant to riparian ownership, and the right to use it is governed by state laws on the subject of private property. As above set forth, the Federal Government can regulate and control it only to such extent as may be necessary in the interest of navigation. Sections 9 and 10 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899, cover cases of this kind, and under this law the interests of the Government can, in my opinion, be better protected than by a law general in its scope, as contemplated by the bill. I do not favor the proposed legislation, but if any is enacted, it should be permissive in its character, simply giving the consent of Congress, with suitable limitations, to the erection of the necessary structures in navigable streams for the development of water power, this consent to be executed through the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, to whom should be left entire control in the matter of plans and details.

A draft of a bill embodying these views is submitted herewith for the consideration of the committee.

Very respectfully,

A. MACKENZIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

By command of Brigadier-General Mackenzie:

FREDERIC V. ABBOT,
Major, Corps of Engineers.

Hearing before Hon. William H. Taft, Secretary of War, in connection with the development of the Illinois Valley water power:

WAR DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
February 23, 1907, 10.30 a. m.

Present, Brig. Gen. Alexander Mackenzie, Chief of Engineers, United States Army; Mr. I. Randolph, representing the State of Illinois; Hon. H. M. SNAPP, Mr. J. W. Woermann, and Mr. Charles A. Monroe, representing the Economy Light and Power Company.

Secretary TAFT. Gentlemen: As I understand this application, it is to prevent me from granting a permit to any person on the Des Plaines River to build a dam for water-power purposes, on the ground that the State is interested in supervising that matter itself. Is that about the size of it?

STATEMENT OF MR. I. RANDOLPH ON BEHALF OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

The position of the State, as I understand it, is this: I am appearing in this matter at the present time for the State, because, as I understand, the Sanitary District has no interest in the present application whatever. The work of the Sanitary District, however, has made possible the development of very, very important water power on the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers. Prior to the completion of that work the water powers on the Des Plaines River were inconsequential. They amounted to but little. The water power on the Illinois River was somewhat better. There was no development at Marseilles. But the opening of the sanitary district naturally has turned into those rivers a permanent volume of water, which makes the development of the water powers possible on quite a valuable scale.

The interest of the State in this is to see that this asset is developed to the fullest extent and that it shall be so developed as not to interfere with the creation of a waterway such as the State hopes to see put through. * * *

Mr. SAPP. If the General Government has no right either in this property or to the water power developed thereby, there can properly be no determination of this matter by any of the officers of the Government. Now, as a matter of fact, all the property interest in the Des Plaines Valley belongs to private parties. There is absolutely no public ownership of any land in the Des Plaines Valley. The stream is not a navigable stream. In low water the entire flow of the Des Plaines River would come probably through a 6-inch pipe. It falls down hill, falling 100 feet in less than 30 miles. Neither the flow of the water nor the contour of the land makes the stream navigable, and it has been so held.

Secretary TAFT. You say the Des Plaines River is not a navigable stream?

Mr. SAPP. It is not a navigable stream either in law or in fact. It could not be navigated in low water, in the natural condition of the river, by a birch-bark canoe.

Secretary TAFT. How do we get any jurisdiction of it, General Mackenzie?

Mr. SAPP. Let me answer, Mr. Secretary, as a lawyer. You undoubtedly have none, and I was going to bring to the attention of the Secretary——

Secretary TAFT. Why do you come here for a permit, then?

Mr. Sapp then explains that they did not come for a permit, but for advice to be more safe to proceed.

Mr. Randolph then states that the river is meandered by the surveys, and thinks that might make it navigable. Secretary Taft answers that has nothing to do with determining whether the river is navigable. A long conversation follows, after which Secretary Taft rendered the following decision, taken down in shorthand and now on file in the War Department with the Chief of Engineers:

OPINION.

There are two answers to the contention of the State of Illinois in this matter. The application, if I understand it—and it is rather informal than otherwise—is for this department to take no official action which may interfere with the state control of the water power, which may be developed in the Des Plaines River under a proposed improvement by the construction of a 14-foot waterway; and also to take no action which may interfere with the waterway as a waterway.

There are two answers to that. The department is not going to take any action, and has not taken any action. The advisory step, taken at the instance of Mr. Sapp, or the persons who intended to put some sort of water-power construction in the Des Plaines River, was extra official, and really was beyond the authority of the Chief of Engineers, except as he was accommodating to express an opinion in the interest of explanation. The truth is that the Des Plaines River, not being a navigable stream, no permit was necessary to put any obstruction into it which the War Department could prevent. But even if it had been a navigable stream, and even if the application had been made, and properly made to this department, to say whether this would interfere with navigation if the department concluded it would not interfere with navigation, then it is not within the power of the department to withhold its expressing such an opinion and granting such a permit, so far as the United States is concerned, for the purpose of aiding the State in controlling the water power. If the State has any control over the water power, which it may exercise in conflict with the claimed rights of the riparian owner, then it must exercise it itself, through its own legislation and through its own executive officers. All the United States does, assuming it to be a navigable stream, is merely to protect the navigation of the stream. With reference to the water power, it has no function except in respect to water power, which it itself creates by its own investment in property that it itself owns; and then, of course, it may say how that water power shall be used.

But with respect to the water power on a navigable stream, which may be exercised without interference with the use of the river for navigation purposes, that is controlled by the laws of the State. It is controlled by the riparian ownership and by the common law as it governs those rights. Therefore I do not see, with reference to this matter, that this department has any function to perform or which it can perform.

It has merely offered a friendly suggestion, with reference to a possible improvement of the river, which has not been authorized and which until it is authorized can not be regarded as giving any right to this Government to interfere in the use of the stream, the proposed action of the private owners here would not be in conflict with such a plan. That is an expression of an opinion with reference to existing plans, but not with respect to existing conditions.

Therefore what General Mackenzie has done, out of the kindness of his heart, does not commit this department to any assertion of authority in the matter and certainly does not carry us to the necessity of retracing our steps and saying that they shall go on with this when we had not any power to interfere at all.

It is not that we approve this; it is not that we disapprove it. It is that we have nothing whatever to do with it. That is the truth of it. If the State wishes to control the matter of the water power, then it is for the legislature, through which it can express that view, in so far as it may constitutionally affect it by legislation.

General MACKENZIE. That is virtually what was told the governor, Mr. Secretary, and this is the result of one of our indorsements.

Secretary TAFT. All right; I think that disposes of it.

PREVENTION OF TRACHOMA.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, in common with a good many Senators, I have been receiving a circular letter with reference to some questions concerning immigration. After receiving a good many of them, I sent some copies to the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and asked for information upon the question. I have this morning with me a copy of the circular that has been coming to us by the hundred. I ask to have it put in the RECORD, and also to have read to the Senate the reply of the Commissioner-General of Immigration.

There being no objection, the circular letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. E. J. BURKETT.
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned takes liberty to call your attention to the inhuman and often brutal treatment of German-Russian immigrants on account of the disease of their eyes. Numerous cases have been published in the Dakota Freie Presse, where immigrants, before leaving their country, had their eyes examined by a specialist, were then examined at the port before boarding the steamer and were declared healthy; but on arrival at Ellis Island were refused to land on account of suffering from trachoma, which, in many cases, was not at all trachoma, according to the diagnosis of European specialists, but simply an inflammation of the eyes from being exposed to wind, dust, bad air in the steerage, and sleeplessness, which could easily be cured within a short time, were they given the proper treatment. But, as the practice now is, the sick members of the family are sent back to Europe regardless of the helpless condition in which they are. After having sold all their property in the old country, they, in many cases, have just enough money to pay their fare to the destination in some German-Russian settlement in the United States, where relatives and friends would take care of them. After being examined by specialists in Europe they board the steamer convinced of being healthy. Now imagine their fate, when, at their arrival at Ellis Island and near their destination, they are told that one or more of their children will not be allowed to land, and will be returned to where they came from! Often the whole family returns heartbroken, ruined, homeless, hopeless, to lead the life of paupers; often the mother, with the refused children, returns to the old country, while the father, with the admitted children, goes on to find a homestead in the prairies of the Dakotas or some other State. In some cases the mother will find work as a washerwoman or servant in Liverpool, Antwerp, Bremen, or Hamburg, while her sick children are treated and her husband over here works diligently to earn money enough to support his beloved ones on the other side of the ocean. After the children have been declared cured, they and mother again board the steamer and sail for America, but often they will be turned out a second time, and there are cases where people have tried three times in vain to land on our shores.

Our Constitution is built upon a humane basis; our laws are more humane than those of European countries; still our President Roosevelt appeals in his last message to our courts to give our Constitution and laws a more humane appliance. If anywhere more humanity is needed in the appliance or execution of our immigration laws, and I believe the remedy will be found if the cause of the evil is known. It is un-American to destroy family happiness. We have recently appropriated $800,000 for the sufferers in Italy. Perhaps one-eighth of this amount would avoid all the suffering that is now brought to hundreds or thousands of families every year through the enforcement of our immigration laws.

There are, in my opinion, many ways to a remedy. One would be to station an American physician in each European port, where the inspection should be final. An immigrant, who passes such examination before he goes on board should be allowed to land here. Another and a more humane idea would be to erect a proper hospital at Ellis Island, where all those suffering from trachoma or inflamed eyes should be treated and cured at a minimum expense to themselves. If our Government would erect such a hospital, employ specialists, and cure the suffering immigrants, they or their relatives would willingly agree to pay for their board rather than be returned to Europe. Thousands of German-Russians, now prospering American citizens, would gladly contribute to such humanitary institutions, as many expressions to the Dakota Freie Presse indicate.

Something ought to be done to take this brutal point from our Immigration law and prove to the world that we are a humane nation in every respect. To this end I most respectfully ask your help and cooperation. It might be advisable to have a committee appointed to investigate this matter and to find ways and means for a remedy. I would refer you to Dr. C. C. Young, of Wichita Falls, Tex., who has made some personal investigations in the matter, and who could give you some valuable information. By giving this matter your best attention and quick action you will earn the gratitude of the entire German-Russian population of the United States.

Yours, very respectfully,

NIC. OCHSNER, Sutton, Nebr.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR,
BUREAU OF IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION,
Washington, February 17, 1909.

Hon. E. J. BURKETT,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 13th instant, transmitting several copies of a printed circular letter bearing various signatures, the purport of this circular being that Russian-German immigrants are improperly treated and discriminated against in the matter of medical examination at Ellis Island, which results in their rejection on account of being afflicted with the disease known as "trachoma."

The party who prepared this circular evidently believes that the passing of these persons by medical examiners employed by the steamship companies at foreign ports should be all-sufficient, but it only need be pointed out that the immigration act of February 20, 1907, prescribes that the physical and mental condition of aliens shall be determined by duly designated United States Public Health and Marine-Hospital surgeons. The assertion that there is discrimination against one particular class of arrivals is hardly worthy of denial, as you will realize how improbable such a condition could be.

The steamship companies are under penalty of $100 for each alien brought to this country who is afflicted with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease that might have been detected at the port of embarkation by a competent medical examination; that the companies may fail to carry out their obligation to their passengers by adopting proper measures to avoid the hardship of a fruitless voyage is something that this Government can not control, except by the imposition of fines of the character mentioned, and there has been no leniency shown with respect to enforcing this feature of the law. On the other hand, large numbers of arriving aliens who have been found to be diseased were allowed hospital treatment at the expense of their relatives or of the Government, to avoid the peculiar hardship which is always involved in separating the members of a family.

The suggestion that medical officers employed by this Government be stationed at the various foreign ports of embarkation is impracticable, as this proposition was exhaustively considered some time ago and it was ascertained through the Department of State that several of the foreign governments objected to the assignment of American medical officers at their ports for the purpose of examining aliens about to embark for the United States. Furthermore, such examination would not satisfy the requirements of section 17 of the immigration act, which prescribes a medical examination at the port of entry and which would undoubtedly lead to the rejection of many aliens for physical causes which could not be detected at the time of embarkation, but would, nevertheless, bring such aliens within one or more of the classes specifically excluded by the statute. The hardships incident to deportation would therefore only be partially mitigated by the adoption of the plan suggested.

In conclusion, I desire to invite your attention to the fact that the circular letter referred to carefully refrains from mentioning any specific case as a basis for the allegations therein contained; and if you would like to examine the papers relating to the cases in which Dr. C. C. Young, of Wichita Falls, Tex., was interested, the files are open for your inspection, and I invite you to examine them, feeling certain that after doing so you will concur in the conclusion that Doctor Young has been accorded more consideration than the methods which have been adopted by him really justify.

Respectfully,
DANL. J. KEEFE,
Commissioner-General.

Mr. BURKETT. I move that the letter and the circular be printed in the form of a document (S. Doc. No. 729) and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

The motion was agreed to.

H. R. 24327. An act to make Corry, Pa., a port of delivery in the district of Erie, Pa., and extending to it the privileges of section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 257. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of State to invite the Governments of France and Great Britain to participate in the proposed tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain by Samuel de Champlain was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, and I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I interpose an objection for a moment, to say just a few words, if I may be permitted.

This bill was reported yesterday from the committee. It is a bill of thirty-odd pages and carries, as I am informed upon inquiry, some $235,000,000. The bill does not show on its face the total amount appropriated. It is accompanied by a report of five lines, which gives no information whatever with respect to the changes that have been made in the bill by the Senate committee.

If I understand the request the chairman has just made, it is to take up the consideration of this bill for action upon the Senate committee amendments at once. It is proposed to proceed without any statement by the chairman as to the changes made by the Senate committee to the House bill and without any light whatever that will aid Senators intelligently to pass upon these amendments.

Mr. President, I make a protest against this form of proceeding. This bill has been in the possession of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for twenty days. They found it necessary to spend that amount of time upon it. It seems to me that the Senate is entitled to a little time after the printing of a bill to examine it and make some inquiry in respect to it. It is not an unreasonable request to make of the chairman that the bill shall go over at least for one day. Even that allows small opportunity to Senators who feel a responsibility for legislation to make any investigation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the bill reached the Senate from the House January 28, and it has been accessible to any Member of this body since that date. The Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has made very few changes in the bill as it came from the House. About $56,000 has been added to this enormous appropriation by the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, or rather there is that difference between the amount carried by the bill as it passed the House and the bill as reported from the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

What few changes have been made in the bill have, I believe, with one single exception, been made on the particular and special request of the Postmaster-General or one of the Assistant Postmasters-General. Within my recollection, and I have been ten years upon the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, there has not been a bill reported that required less explanation or in which fewer changes have been made than the present measure.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not delay the proceedings on the bill by persisting in his objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very glad to have had that much explanation given with respect to the bill and the changes made in it. Since the opening of the session, about thirty minutes ago, when I found the printed bill upon by table, I have made some calculations with respect to decreases and increases in its appropriations. It appears that the decreases amount to $198,000, and the increases to some $337,000, a net increase of $139,000 in the bill as it came from the House. I may be mistaken about it, because I have had to make my calculations very hurriedly.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has made them hurriedly, and he is mistaken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to say just this, Mr. President, that I protest against any bill of this magnitude and importance coming to the Senate without a report that gives any information whatever with respect to it. And I object to the implied criticism which confronts a Senator every time he rises here to make what is only a reasonable and proper request for an opportunity to get a little information before he is required to vote upon these important matters.

I hope the chairman will feel that the exigencies of the situation are not such as to compel him to force the consideration of the bill to-day. A day might disclose changes that would lead a Senator to wish to visit the Post-Office Department, since we have no report and no information furnished with respect to these changes.

I for one would like to have an opportunity to read the bill with some care, such as I can not give to it in the confusion of the session. I trust the chairman will grant that indulgence, and permit the bill to go over until to-morrow morning. For my part I should be perfectly willing that the session should start earlier to-morrow morning, but I should like that small opportunity to inform myself with respect to the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. As the reading of the bill progresses I shall very cheerfully give the Senator any information he may desire as to any item. He could not in twenty-four hours know much more about the bill than he does to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit an interruption, that method of proceeding places every Senator who makes an inquiry completely at the mercy of the view of the Senator who is informed and who makes the explanation. Sometimes a Senator finds, when explanations have been made, that if he could have had a little further information than was given he might have arrived at a very different conclusion with reference to the matter. Or he might have interrogated the Senator making the explanation and still more light might be thrown upon the subject. I believe that we shall make more progress and better progress with the consideration of this bill and every other appropriation bill if a reasonable time is allowed after the bills are reported before their consideration is forced upon the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has made any effort up to the present time by reading the testimony taken before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House or in any other way to familiarize himself with this subject?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not been able to give any attention to that subject. Now, I am frank to say that one reason why it seems to me that in a degree that matter would be somewhat fruitless is that we never know what changes are to be made. A bill comes to the committee of the Senate from the House. It may be wholly changed, and the Senator and all of us, I think, are pressed with the duties that devolve upon us. A Senator does not want to make a fruitless expenditure of time upon a bill. If he could know that the testimony taken before the other body and the bill as it came from the other body would be subjected to very few changes, and the testimony which he wades through would have application to the bill in the form in which it is to come before the Senate, then it would be a very different proposition.

The Senator says there are very few changes made in this bill. I find on running it over that they appear on a great many pages. I do not know the significance. I should like to know.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall be very glad, as the reading of the bill progresses, to explain anything that the Senator may desire and which may be obscure to him, but I must persist in my request.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think I have made my purpose clear here. I am not obstructing legislation.

Mr. PENROSE. I have made a motion, and debate is out of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am seeking, and will get if I can, light on these important bills.

Mr. PENROSE. I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 26305.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for the purpose of the consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To that I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be attentively at his desk while the bill is being read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I discharge my duty on this floor as I see it without any suggestion from the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina, as he has given notice to the Senate that he desires to address the Senate this morning.

THE IMMIGRATION COMMISSION.

Mr. GARY. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution No. 279 be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, which will be read.

The Secretary read resolution No. 279, submitted by Mr. GARY on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Immigration Commission, created by section 39 of "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, be, and hereby is, directed to report forthwith to the Congress a brief summary of its acts, doings, and present work, together with an itemized statement of its expenditures, giving the amounts, purpose for which spent, to whom and for whom or what paid, and a list of all persons that have been or now are employed by the commission, directly or indirectly, their residence at time of appointment, the length of service, salary paid, and all allowances, and such other information as will give the Senate an idea of the amount of money and length of time it will take the commission to complete its labors and make its recommendations and final report.

Mr. GARY. Mr. President, in view of the short time remaining of this session, and the large number of appropriation bills yet to be acted upon, I am not unmindful that the time of this body is precious. I would be loath to consume any part of it, but, for reasons that must be manifest, I must speak now or not at all. Besides, Mr. President, there is no problem of more vital interest to the American people, or one more urgently calling for solution, than the problem of immigration. The subject embraces not only the constant importation of hordes of illiterate, unassimilable, and undesirable citizens from the cesspools of Europe, but it embraces the invasion of the Pacific slope by the yellow man from the Orient as well. Whatever may be the feelings excited in us when we consider the two classes, whether they be feelings of admiration or disgust and loathing, still the ultimate effect upon the peace, morality, and homogeneity of our race will be the same from each class if the importation is unchecked. He must, indeed, be an optimist with childlike faith who can contemplate the situation without concern for the future of our country, now menaced on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The problem is one which, like Banquo's ghost, will not down, no matter how much we may desire to repress or shun it. But it should be approached with the calmest judgment, the highest patriotism, and the most enlightened statesmanship; and, as the Senator from Nevada well says, "No question involving such important considerations as race homogeneity and domestic industrial peace can safely be turned over to diplomacy."

It will be recalled that the Congress of the United States, on account of a disagreement between the two Houses on the enactment of an immigration restriction bill that would tend to solve the problem, inserted a provision in the immigration act, for the appointment of a commission of nine, composed of three Senators, three Representatives, and three laymen, to be appointed by the President, for the purpose of making an investigation, in the United States and abroad, of the subject of immigration with a view of determining what the conditions are and with a view of determining what legislation should be enacted. This commission was appointed two years ago. The provision which created the board required that a report should be made to Congress. It will be recalled, too, that this commission is practically unlimited as to the amount it may spend, and is unlimited as to the number of persons it may employ in its service. Whether or not the provision creating this immigration commission was enacted for the purpose of sidetracking and preventing needed legislation, as some have asserted, is not for me to say. Such a suggestion would serve no good purpose at this time. It is proper to say, however, that from a commission so constituted and so unhampered, the American people had a right to expect, before now, some light and some suggestion as a basis for legislation against the evil conditions that surround us, and which each day multiply. The books of the auditor and vouchers show that this commission has already expended upward of $358,000, and the end is not yet.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GARY. I do.

Mr. FLINT. I should like to ask the Senator a question just at that point. Does the Senator know what salaries are being paid to these commissioners?

Mr. GARY. I was coming to that. I know the salaries of some of them. There is a professor in one of the colleges who, as one of the commission, if I am reliably informed, gets a salary of $7,500 a year and two hundred or three hundred dollars a month expenses. There is among the employees a secret-service man, as I understand, who has been at work in the southern part of California and on the Mexican border. His salary would amount to seven or eight thousand dollars a year, as he drew over a thousand dollars for the month of March, 1908. I presume he gets about that amount monthly. As to the salaries of the others, I am not informed.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I think it is only fair to the appointing power that a statement should be made as to the salaries of the commissioners. The Senator from South Carolina is aware that there are three Senators upon this commission and three Members of the House of Representatives, who receive no salary whatever, and that every member of that commission is giving a very large amount of work to the purposes of the commission.

Under the act the President appointed three commissioners—Professor Jenks, of Cornell University; Mr. William R. Wheeler, of California; and Doctor Neill, the Commissioner of Labor. The President fixed their salaries at the sum received by Members of Congress—that is, $7,500 a year. Professor Jenks is receiving that salary and giving substantially all of his time to the work.

Mr. Wheeler is the Assistant Commissioner of Commerce and Labor, receiving a salary of $5,000 a year from that source, and he receives the balance of $2,500 under this act. I can say the same as to Doctor Neill, who is the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say that there never was an hour when this man Neill could earn one-third of $7,500 a year outside of the government service.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from California?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. I simply want to ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] another question before he takes his seat, in reference to whether these commissioners are devoting their entire time to this work and receiving a salary of $7,500 a year?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I understand that Professor Jenks is giving substantially all of his time to the work. As to the other two commissioners, they are engaged in the work I have already indicated, in the positions which I have named, and the salaries received there are deducted from the salaries fixed by the President for their services as members of the commission.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLINT. In other words, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understood the Senator from South Carolina to state that the total expenses thus far had been about $350,000.

Mr. GARY. Three hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. NEWLANDS. They have been $358,000. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has stated that the salaries in the aggregate amount to about $22,500 a year—three salaries of $7,500 each.

Mr. BACON. Not that much, for the salaries received from other sources are deducted.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; as the Senator from Georgia well says, the salaries received from other sources by the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor and the Chief of the Bureau of Labor, I believe it is, must be deducted, amounting to about $10,000, so that the total amount paid for salaries out of this appropriation is $12,500 per annum. I inquire of the Senator what the remainder of this large sum of $358,000 is made up of?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. If I may be allowed to make a suggestion at this point, it may save time. Of course, I had no intimation what was to be said by the Senator from South Carolina or what direction this debate would take. I have not, of course, with me this morning the papers and data with which to answer all these questions. Had I known the discussion was to take this trend, I would have had them. I do not run away from any inquiry. I do not run away from any debate on this subject. I heartily favor the resolution or a substitute which will make it even better than it is, which I understand the Senator from South Carolina desires to offer; and I would be very glad this morning if the Senator could be allowed to make his speech. I will favor his resolution, and I will see that the commission sends to the Senate the fullest kind of a report upon every subject covered by it.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina, with his permission, by whom were the appointments to be made?

Mr. GARY. By the commission, I assume. That is the information we want to secure by this resolution.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator said, or I thought he said, that the President had fixed the salary of the men appointed at $7,500 a year. Was that authority given him by the act?

Mr. GARY. The appointment of the citizen members of the Immigration Commission is an absolutely distinct, separate, and independent matter from the special commission appointed February 24, 1906, and about the legal creation of this latter special commission I do not know. I was merely bringing it up to show that the employment of Michael Clayton, who was paid at the rate of $7,000 or $8,000 a year, was simply a duplication of work.

Mr. MONEY. Is the Senator able to tell me by what authority the President of the United States fixes the pay of anybody whom he appoints?

Mr. GARY. As I said, I do not know what legislative authority the President had for appointing the special commission which he appointed on February 24, 1906. The immigration act of February 20, 1907, gave him authority to appoint three citizen members of the immigration commission created thereby, and to fix the salaries of these three.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the junior Senator from South Carolina yield to the senior Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the Senator discovered that this man Clayton has given any new information, or is he merely traveling over the same old route and repeating practically the same information that the other officers have already given?

Mr. GARY. That is the point I was making, that he is simply duplicating the work that has recently been done by a special commission appointed by the President and by Commissioner Braun, who had done it officially and filed his report with the Department of Commerce and Labor, and a part of whose report is to be found in the annual report of the Commissioner-General for 1907.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, I should like to ask the Senator form Vermont a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GARY. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Vermont stated that the three commissioners, outside of the Members of the Senate and House serving on the commission, had had their pay fixed by the President. I understood him to say that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. By the President.

Mr. BACON. Does the act authorize that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not remember whether there is a special provision in the act for that; but my impression is that such a provision was inserted.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will look at the act and inform us, because, while it is true that we are to have the report subsequently, when this matter passes from our attention we do not have time to look up these reports, and I should like to know, while this debate is going on, whether or not the act does authorize this, or whether the President has done it voluntarily.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will procure a copy of the act and look that up.

Mr. GARY. Mr. President, to proceed at the point where I left off when interrupted.

On the pay roll there is one man whose salary is $7,500 per annum in addition to his expenses, which amount to about $200 per month. I am reliably informed that this man has not lost a day from his regular work as professor since his employment by the commission. He is ready to report as to his work, yet his salary continues. Another expensive employee of the Immigration Commission is Michael Clayton. According to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of January 26, ultimo, this secret-service man has been looking into the smuggling of Japanese and Chinese coolies over the Mexican border, a matter fully investigated by a special commission, composed of R. M. Easley, J. W. Jenks, and J. B. Reynolds, appointed by the President February 24, 1906, whose report is in the hands of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and by such able, fearless investigators as Marcus Braun, whose findings of enormous smuggling were published in part by the Commissioner-General in his annual report for 1907. Clayton's total salary and allowances for the month of March, 1908, were $1,025, made up of $20 per diem compensation, $8 per diem hotel allowance, and over $5 per diem traveling expenses.

There are many and apparently well-founded complaints as to the lax enforcement of such restriction laws as we now have which are intended to prohibit the importation of undesirable aliens. There are complaints that the existing laws are inadequate; yet the light so much desired and the suggestions so impatiently awaited, have not been forthcoming. The resolution we are considering seeks to bring forth at an early day a report from this commission.

That the existing conditions are viewed with alarm by thoughtful men, men who have the welfare of our country at heart, must be obvious to all. The action of state legislatures, immigration conferences, national and state farmers' unions, patriotic societies, commercial clubs, newspapers, and all other organizations, societies, and representatives of public opinion, show most conclusively that the subject is a live one and one demanding attention. Certainly the agricultural elements of the South and West are alive to the situation and are calling in no uncertain tones that something be done to check the influx. Listen to the demand, if you please, of the representatives of two millions of farmers assembled in national convention:

Resolved, That the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, in national convention assembled, at Memphis, Tenn., this 8th day of January, 1908, and representing two millions of farmers, urge upon Congress the immediate abolition of the federal bureau of distribution and the speedy enactment of laws substantially excluding the present enormous alien influx, by means of an increased head tax, a money requirement, the illiteracy test, and other measures; and that we call upon our public and especially our state officials, to prevent the agricultural sections from becoming a dumping ground for foreign immigration.

Of the same tenor are the resolutions passed in June, 1907, by the last National Council Junior Order United American Mechanics, representing thousands of patriotic workingmen.

To the same effect and equally as strong are the resolutions passed by the American Federation of Labor at its last annual convention at Denver, Colo., November 14, 1908.

Equally emphatic are the resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the Knights of Labor at Washington, D. C., November, 1908.

From another source, but quite as significant, are the resolutions of the legislature of the State of Virginia passed last winter unanimously by both houses:

Resolved by the senate of Virginia (the house of delegates concurring), That our Representatives in both Houses of Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to oppose in every possible manner the influx into Virginia of immigrants from southern Europe, with their Mafia and Black Hand murder societies, and with no characteristics to make them with us a homogeneous people, believing as we do that upon Anglo-Saxon supremacy depends the future welfare and prosperity of this Commonwealth, and we view with alarm any effort that may tend to corrupt its citizenship.

I might also cite the message of President Roosevelt to Congress in December, 1905, a short time before this commission was created, in which he says:

The question of immigration is of vital interest to this country. In the year ending June 30, 1905, there came to the United States 1,026,000 alien immigrants. Moreover, a considerable proportion of it, probably a very large proportion, including most of the undesirable class, does not come here of its own initiative, but because of the activities of agents of transportation companies. These agents are distributed throughout Europe, and by offer of all kinds of inducements they wheedle and cajole many immigrants, often against their own interests, to come here. The most serious obstacle we have to encounter in the effort to secure proper regulation of immigration to these shores, arises from the detrimental opposition of foreign steamship lines, who have no interest whatever in the matter, save to increase the returns on their capital by carrying masses of immigration hither in the steerage of their ships.

As bearing out the statement of the President, as to the agencies responsible for the existing conditions, we might mention an extract from the report of the commissioner-general for 1907, where he says:

Another year's experience but emphasizes and confirms the conviction that a considerable part of the large immigration of the past few years is forced or artificial. Two separate and distinct factors are from interested motives responsible for such of the immigration as is not natural: first, the violators and evaders of the contract labor feature of the law; and, second, the steamship runners and agencies.

And speaking of the influence toward immigration of letters from previous immigrants in this country he says:

The worst of it is that there are evidences that this endless chain-letter scheme is seized upon by the promoters and money lenders to further their interests, and no opportunity lost to encourage both the writing and extensive dissemination of such missives. When this is done the line is passed between natural and forced immigration, and the machinations of the promoter and usurer become a menace to the aliens directly, and to the welfare of this country incidentally.

This steamship activity, of course, has been made possible by the changed character of steamship construction, the recent building of fleet steel ocean liners, and has brought about, owing to our feeble laws and their lax administration, a startling change in the character of our immigration. One of the most noticeable effects has been the shifting of its source from the kindred peoples of northwest Europe to the alien brownish races of southeast Europe. That the profit-making choice by these foreign steamship lines and the connivance of certain European governments are not giving us the best, even of these peoples, but much of their poorest, are matters of repeated official record. Our inspector, Marcus Braun, a foreigner by birth and a resident of New York City by choice, who was sent abroad on a tour of inspection several years ago, made the astonishing discovery of documentary evidence that the Hungarian Government had actually made a contract with the Cunard Steamship Line to deliver for transportation to this country a minimum of 30,000 Hungarians annually. The Austrian officials, of course, were soon ready with plausible explanations, but Mr. Braun's report clearly demonstrates that that Government was not engaged in any philanthropic or altruistic enterprise.

It was a plain bargain to dump upon our shores at least 30,000 of her worst, most degraded slum population, if not her criminal and social outlaws and outcasts. It is a series of facts of this character which leads Mr. Braun to conclude that some European governments, as well as private individuals and interested societies, still regard the United States as a dumping ground for thousands of their most undesirable persons. A knowledge of the actual conditions, he concludes, would drive the blood of humiliation to the face of every good American, whether native or naturalized, and a description of them would defy the pen of a Macaulay. That these scandalous conditions still exist is evidenced by the more recent report of Dr. Maurice Fishberg; by the letters of Mr. Herbert F. Sherwood, correspondent of the Liberal Immigration League, a propagandist organization, who was with the commission on its European junket two years ago this coming summer; and by the still more recent official report of Special Inspector John Greenberg, who visited Europe last summer, and whose report is now in the hands of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

It is unlikely, Mr. President, that these foreign corporations will at any time in the near future be brought to a realization of the enormity of their sins or of the great injustice their greed is doing the American people, for—

If self the wavering balance shake,
'Tis rarely right adjusted.

We must, therefore, expect a continuation of this conduct on the part of steamship companies and look upon the past as but a harbinger of what may be expected in the future, unless the Congress of the United States shall call a halt and shall by drastic legislation put a stop to this traffic in human flesh. If further evidence is needed to show that the question is a live one, we might point to the threatened legislation of California—legislation the enactment of which could be prevented only by the powerful influence of the President—and to the legislation enacted in Nevada, which even the power of the President could not prevent.

But, Mr. President, we must speak of the yellow man with bated breath. We may scarcely think strongly about him without the suggestion that some treaty right has been infringed, and the resultant need of four battle ships is proclaimed. But we may as well face the situation now, unpleasant though it be. The history of the world does not record an instance where two races have at one and the same time occupied the same territory upon terms of equality. One must be subservient to the other or they must assimilate. Where two races are trying to occupy the same territory, one of three conditions must be brought about inevitably—either amalgamation, extermination, or subordination of one to the other. Who knows anything of the Japanese character knows that he will not stand for either amalgamation or extermination nor for subordination longer than the conditions make it necessary. It seems to me, therefore, that before the situation has attained unmanageable proportions, or before it shall have become acute, it would be the part of wisdom for Congress to enact and enforce such prohibitive laws as will stop the incoming tide from the Orient. But I will not pursue this branch of the subject further, except to say that sooner or later we must meet the situation, and the sooner it is met and some adjustment made the better it will be for all parties concerned. If the assertion of supposed rights by the Japanese is vexatious now, what is to make it less annoying in the future?

The other branch of the subject, viz, the flooding of the East and Middle West by an ever-increasing stream of illiterate Hungarians, Poles, Greeks, Turks, Syrians, Arabs, and South Russians, is still more dangerous because more insidious. As the Manufacturer's Record says in an editorial:

This mongrelism, congesting the great cities of the East, is a far greater menace to American labor, American institutions, and American life than the comparatively pure stock of the Japanese and Chinese of the West.

Who, Mr. President, can contemplate the situation without feelings of loathing and abhorrence for the miserable creatures and apprehension for the effect upon our Anglo-Saxon civilization and democratic institutions? I can not give you a better picture of that situation than by quoting from Dr. Francis A. Walker, who, writing ten years ago, said:

The immigrant of the former time came almost exclusively from western or northern Europe. We have now tapped great reservoirs of population then almost unknown to the passenger lists of our arriving vessels. Only a short time ago the immigrant from southern Italy, Hungary, Austria, and Russia together made up hardly more than 1 per cent of our immigration. To-day the proportion has risen to something like 40 per cent, and threatens soon to become 50 to 60 per cent, or even more. The entrance into our political, social, and industrial life of such vast masses of peasantry, degraded below our utmost conceptions, is a matter which no intelligent patriot can look upon without the gravest apprehension and alarm. These people have no history behind them which is of a nature to give encouragement. They have none of the inherited instincts and tendencies which made it comparatively easy to deal with the immigration of the olden time. They are beaten men of beaten races, representing the worst failures in the struggle for existence. Centuries are against them as centuries were on the side of those who formerly came to us. They have none of the ideas and aptitudes which fit men to take up readily and easily the problem of self-care and self-government, such as belong to those who are descended from the tribes that met under the oak trees of old Germany to make laws and choose chieftains.

In this connection I would ask your especial attention to a statement made by Gen. Theodore A. Bingham, police commissioner of New York City, published in the Cincinnati Inquirer June 20, 1907, couched in modest and discreet language, yet reciting a condition that ought to arrest our attention:

There is another very important thing about this crime business. I don't want to say anything that would be indiscreet, but unquestionably the hordes of immigrants that are coming here have a great deal to do with crimes against women and children.

You will notice that these particular crimes are done by fellows who can't talk the English language. It is this wave of immigration that brings to New York the hundreds of thousands of criminals who don't know what liberty means, and don't care; don't know our customs, can not speak the English language, and are in general the scum of Europe.

Was it for the like of these, Mr. President, that our forefathers braved the hardships and dangers of the wilderness and wrested this land from the savage red man? Was it for the like of these that, later, our sires defied the arrogance of tyrants, that Anglo-Saxon and democratic government might be planted and fostered here? Was it for the South Russian—dull and apathetic, brutalized by long centuries of ignorance, privation, and tyranny; for the Greek, more debased than the Russian, because of his greater intelligence for evil, unscrupulous, quick with the tongue and also not slow with the knife that strikes from behind and in the dark; for the peasants from the Balkans, equally immoral and degraded, but less stolid than the Russian; for the chafferer, fawning and cringing, schooled to duplicity and assassination through long centuries beneath the Turkish lash; for the Hun, turbulent, savage, still half a barbarian; for the Italian, more especially him of Sicily, in picturesque rages, stiletto in his boot, murder in his heart, too often a black heart, bound either as an accomplice, or as a prey to his own black hand?

If it was for these and the like of them that our forefathers fought, bled, and died, then it were better, far better, that America had been left as a happy hunting ground for the red man, better that Boston commons had never resounded with the cry of the patriot, better that Kings Mountain had never been fought.

O, not yet mayst thou
Unbrace thy corslet, nor lay
By thy sword; nor yet, O,
Freedom, close thy lids in Slumber, for thine enemy
Never sleeps, and thou
Must watch and combat
Till the day of the new Earth and Heaven.

But let us look a little further and see what manner of people the steamships are dumping down upon us, and simply because so much per head goes into the company's treasury. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, 1,285,349 aliens were admitted to the United States. This was an increase of over 11 per cent of the previous year (1,100,735), which was also preceded by a banner year.

It is true that for the past fiscal year, ending June 30 last, immigration decreased to 782,870 plus 141,825 "nonimmigrant" aliens. Of this number, only 63,128 had ever been in the United States before. This would leave a new net alien addition to our population of at least 708,840 foreigners for 1908, and it is the assimilation and Americanization of these vast hordes, ever increasing in larger and larger influxes with the return of prosperous times, that constitutes our immigration problem.

About 80 per cent of the present immigration comes from extremely southern and eastern Europe and western Asia, whereas a quarter of a century ago we received practically no emigrants from these sections. This immigration is composed of Slav and Iberic or Mediterranean races, far less capable of amalgamation and absorption than the kindred peoples of northwest Europe which used to come to us and made such good frontiersmen. As a matter of fact, it is the coming and competition of these aliens, with their low standards of living, that have caused the decline in the number of assimilative Baltic peoples.

As to the percentage of able-bodied, strong-minded men and women, it is difficult to speak with any statistical accuracy. The present laws are designed somewhat to keep out the weak-minded and weak bodied, but under its present administration most of them either escape detection, owing to the superficial inspection, or are admitted under bond. This is well shown by the fact that at least one insane or weak-minded, newly landed immigrant is picked up in two boroughs of New York City every day, and also the fact that the States of Massachusetts and New York deliver every day into the hands of immigration authorities from three to four immigrants for deportation, who have become public charges, generally within two or three months after landing. I would call attention to the last report of Theodore Bingham, police commissioner of New York, as showing the insufficiency of our present laws or their lax enforcement when it comes to dealing with the criminal immigrant:

We are trying to handle medieval criminals, men in whose blood runs the spirit of the vendetta, by modern Anglo-Saxon procedure. It is wrong to allow these people to slip into this country. But besides allowing this we give them, once in, every chance to work their blackmail without getting caught. Against this sort of crime our laws are weak. Either they must be kept out, or else a system of procedure must be devised which is potent and immediate enough to handle that sort of crime.

The case of an alien who was arrested on November 27, 1908, will illustrate something of the difficulty the police department works under in trying to keep the city clear of alien criminals.

On November 17, 1908, a warrant was requested for the arrest for deportation of an Italian from Naples. On November 20, 1908, the warrant was issued. On November 27, 1908, the man was arrested and delivered to Ellis Island.

The penal certificate of the man stated that he had been sentenced to eight days' solitary confinement in March, 1908, by the judge of the tribunal of Naples. Besides this, a letter from the Minister of the Interior of Italy stated that this man had committed a brutal murder in Naples, that he attempted to kill his own wife, that he had attempted to kill another man, and that while in the employ of the post-office department he had robbed the mail. The letter went on to say, that on July 10, 1908, this alien was sentenced in his absence, by the court of assize, Naples, Italy, to life imprisonment. All this information was given to the United States authorities.

On December 15, 1908, this alien was discharged from Ellis Island and is now at large in New York City.

The case of another man shows how the United States seems to insist on keeping these blackmailers here.

A man who is at present confined in New York State prison, serving a sentence of two and one-half years for attempted extortion, was arrested in Italy twenty-seven times and convicted twenty-five times. When he was sentenced to State's prison here he had been in this country less than three years. The police department tried to get a warrant for his arrest so he could be deported. The warrant was refused on the ground that the man had, by serving three years in prison, been here more than three years."

Shall we permit a condition so revolting to continue? We look to the commission to tell us how to stop it.

As to the character of the present immigration, I think the opinion of such a man as Hon. William Williams, a recent commissioner of immigration at the port of New York, through which comes the bulk of the influx, is the most reliable information that can be obtained. In his annual report (1903) he said:

The present laws do not reach a large body of immigrants who are generally undesirable, because unintelligent, of low vitality, poor physique, able to perform only the cheapest kind of labor, desirous of settling almost exclusively in the cities, by their competition tending to reduce the standard of living of the American wage-worker, and unfitted either mentally or morally for good citizenship. It would be quite impossible to accurately state what proportion of last year's immigration should be classified as undesirable. I believe that at least 200,000 came here (631,885 entered through Ellis Island), who, although they may be able to earn a living, yet are not wanted and will be of no benefit to the country, and will, on the contrary, be a detriment, because their presence will tend to lower our standards. Their coming has been a benefit chiefly, if not only, to the transportation companies which brought them over.

As to the number of children, middle-aged, and aged people, about 5 per cent are under the age of 14 years, many of whom are still brought in by Greek padrones to work in bootblacking and other similar establishments, where the worst kind of child labor prevails; 85 per cent are between the ages of 14 and 44 years. About one-fourth are females and three-fourths males. From one-fourth to one-third of the adults can not read or write a single line in any language or dialect, not even their own.

But, to return to the question of the congestion of the present immigration in our large cities, let me call your attention to what the Commissioner of Labor says in his seventh annual report, where he points out that of the slum population of Baltimore 77 per cent are foreigners, of Chicago 90 per cent, of Philadelphia 91 per cent, and of New York City 95 per cent, and that southeast Europe furnishes from twenty to seventy-one times as many as does northwest Europe to these congested districts, where they are such a fertile field for the irresponsible agitator and corrupt boss.

A year or two ago Mayor McClellan directed Doctor Darlington, president of the New York City Board of Health, to make a special investigation of the push-cart nuisance. At the conclusion of his investigation Doctor Darlington reported, among other things:

I have heard the assertion that immigration is necessary to carry on our public works, to build railroads, to dig canals, and the like. But the present immigrants now coming over do not come for that purpose and will not do that sort of work. No, they prefer to become push-cart peddlers and to live in our cities in poverty, breeding crime and disease. They occupy our streets, the streets for which our taxpayers have paid heavily. They interfere with traffic and break the laws of sanitation which we have decided are necessary for the preservation of public health.

Now, it is proposed by certain interests to distribute this slum population over the South and West in order to make room for more of the same kind, and one even finds such a paper as the Jacksonville (Florida) Metropolis publishing matter sent out by the railroads under the caption of "Immigration labor for the South."

The Manufacturers' Record tells us that Congress is likely to be asked to set aside a fund for transporting laborers from one place to another and to be thus used on a loan basis, and the reason for this fund is given as follows:

For lack of funds for transportation thousands of aliens living in large cities and who appeal for work are deprived of obtaining remunerative employment. From all parts of the country the cry comes for efficient help, but the laborer in many instances is unable to go because he has not the means to pay his railroad fare. This is the situation confronting the Department of Commerce and Labor, who are trying to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens among the States and Territories desiring laborers.

The editor commenting on this plan, which is nothing more than a plan to relieve congestion in the principal cities and a plan to make more room in which to dump still more immigrants, pertinently says:

"It must be confessed that these southern immigration schemes and other sociological, educational, and economic movements engineered from New York disregard the fact of the South's forty years' fight for the maintenance of white civilization. It must be confessed that if the diverse schemes succeed white civilization must pass from a portion of the South. What care the schemers for that, and what care they for the disinterested warnings as long as the public mind of the South can be diverted from the fundamental questions?"

I take occasion to say just here, lest I be misunderstood, that I, in common with many other Southerners, would welcome to our midst homeseekers, whether they be of foreign or native birth, who from choice have embraced our form of government and wish to be part and parcel of us, and will work with us to build up the waste places and contribute to a free and stable government. But, Mr. President, it is better that our uncultivated lands should forever lie fallow, and our water power go unharnessed to the sea, than that we should be overrun by a lot of aliens from southern Europe, who have been brought here through the cupidity of steamship companies, and who have not left behind them and do not intend to forsake their Black Hand and Mafia methods, and who contribute nothing worth having to the common good. Much is being said about the development of the South's resources in connection with the alien-labor agitation. For myself, I have but little patience with such agitation. I do not see the necessity for all this hot haste to use up the country's treasure, and at the same time make such an outcry for the conservation of our natural resources. Our forests are almost gone and our public domain is exhausted. The South has prospered marvelously and bids fair to make even more rapid strides. This has been accomplished without the aid of such immigration as that which now comes to our principal ports. Without them our white civilization has been maintained, and I, for one, am willing to deal with the future without their aid.

Statistics are always tiresome and dull reading, but at the risk of being tiresome and prolix I must quote a few figures for our information. As to the statistics on crime, pauperism, and insanity according to the census of 1890 (part 2, pages 169, 174, 182), comparing an equal number of foreign element and the native element, we find that the foreigners furnished one and one-half times as many criminals and two and one-third times as many insane, and three times as many paupers. When it comes to the children of native-born parentage and foreign-born parentage, those of foreign parentage are found to be three times as criminal as those of the native parentage.

According to the annual report of the Commissioner-General of Immigration for 1904, the foreign born in all the public institutions of the United States constitute 28 per cent, whereas there were but about 10,000,000 foreign-born persons out of a population of 80,000,000 of people. His report also shows that there were 44,985 alien inmates of penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions in the United States, 64 per cent of whom were Slavic, Iberic, or Mediterranean races, and that out of the 800 confined for murder 253 were Italians, and of 373 confined for attempt of murder 139 were Italians. According to the last annual report of the commissioner-general the number of aliens confined in our penal, insane, and charitable institutions has increased during the past four years from 44,985 to 60,501, an increase of 15,516, or about 34 per cent.

In New York State, which has a population one-fourth foreign and three-fourths native, from one-half to three-fourths of the inmates of public state institutions are foreigners, who cost that State over $10,000,000 annually—a very fitting sacrifice to those foreign gods of transportation. But more important are facts from an official report like that of Chief Magistrate Wahle's concerning the criminal prosecutions in the city of New York for 1905. He says that there was an increase for the year of 18,388 arraignments (25 per cent), and that all of this increase were southeast Europeans.

We have undertaken to show that the question of immigration is a vital pressing question and that we must face it. We have undertaken to show that on account of the greed of the steamship companies and other subagencies throughout Europe the greater percentage of the immigrants coming to our shores is of persons steeped in degradation and in the lowest intellectual and physical class. What will be the effect of this admixture of the lowest types of humanity with the Anglo-Saxon race is a question that ought to concern all who are proud of our Anglo-Saxon lineage and of our achievements in the past. That our type of national character is in serious danger from the interbreeding of native and alien stocks in the country has been affirmed on numerous occasions and by those whose opinions we should heed. A recent study by Alfred P. Schultz, just published, called "Race or Mongrels," clearly points this out. In this book Mr. Schultz shows that all the great races of history, such as the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Phoenicians, Hindoos, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans were great only so long as, like the Jews, they kept their race free from mixture with alien types. In opposing the views of the superficial optimists, who claim that all sorts and conditions of races can be somehow welded together to produce a new and wonderful breed, Mr. Schultz relies upon the recent discoveries in biology, tending to show the paramount importance of heredity. He says:

As well expect to produce a more perfect dog by breeding together at random a dozen different kinds. It is no less rational to expect to make mongrels into refined dogs by teaching them tricks than to imagine that a few years of schooling, flag exercises, and civic instructions will make the deteriorated half-breed of Southern Europe into desirable American citizens. The ideas, ideals, and institutions of a nation change with its racial composition. Crossing must cease or America will develop into another Imperial Rome.

Recently a Canadian editor, after acknowledging the many virtues of the New Englander, stated with some condescension:

You are becoming a race of mongrels. For years you have admitted, without let or hindrance, the scum of Europe to your citizenship, and you are now beginning to reap the consequences. That is why your politics are so corrupt, your trusts so tyrannical, your public sentiment so unorganized and feeble, your Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic traditions of conservatism and civic and financial morality so nearly extinct. "Canada, not the United States," he concluded with sublime faith, "is destined to be the new world Anglo-Saxon nationality of the future."

I might add in passing that it is significant that Pan, who was the son of everybody, was the ugliest of the gods.

Recently, as pointed out by the Canadian editor, a decided change has taken place in the character of our population in certain localities. The early Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic people who gave us our principles of liberty, our democratic institutions, and, in fact, our very civilization itself, have been overcome. Chicago has become one of the largest Polish cities in the world, New York one of the largest Italian cities, and Boston one of the largest Slav-Iberic cities. It is in these large northern cities, with their vast majority of persons of foreign extraction, that is, foreign birth or foreign parentage, that aggressive rottenness and dishonesty in municipal affairs is attracting public opinion and condemnation. It is in these large foreign cities of the North that popular government, as our Teutonic and Anglo-Saxon forefathers conceived it, has been displaced by the despotic boss; and a profound distrust of democracy has taken hold upon the educated and property-holding classes, who fashion public opinion. Of late attempts have been made in a number of these cities, with their vast foreign population, to limit materially local self-government. A little over a year ago there was created in Boston a finance commission, composed of the very best citizens, for the purpose of investigating and reporting on the existing intolerable municipal conditions. The report of that commission has just been made and deals exhaustively with the situation. Among other things, the commission says:

The present electoral machinery is wholly unsuited for the requirements of successful municipal government through popular suffrage; and recommends to the legislature the passage of a bill which will completely change the present form of city government, and divide the responsibility between the people of Boston and the legislature. This, mind you, was the once refined and cultured Boston, the Arcady of America; Boston, that has now become so infested with aliens, thought to be incapable of self-government, that it is asked that the municipal government be divided between the people of Boston and the legislature of Massachusetts. It is not surprising that schemes are being devised and ways and means provided whereby this congested mass of humanity may be pushed on to the South and West. It is history repeating itself. But if you will insist on permitting these steamship companies to bring such people to your ports for the sake of the revenue that is in the traffic, then we say keep them, even if the dose does choke you. Do not push them off on us. We will get on without them. This admonition is unnecessary, however, for the reason that the immigrant that is now being admitted can not be induced, cajoled, or even forced to leave the large cities.

In the light of what has just been related, may we not exclaim with Associate Justice Brewer:

May not the original Anglo-Saxon stock be submerged? Will republican institutions stand the continuous influx of people who know nothing of self-control and who look upon all government as an enemy? We have boasted that our liberty was a liberty of law, and left no room for revolution or riot, but certain occurrences in Colorado and elsewhere have shown that this is not always true. May not the forces against law become strong enough to break it down? Is not the Anglo-Saxon principle of liberty worth preserving, even if it should be necessary to restrict or put a stop to immigration? It is a question, at any rate, that should not be settled by sentiment, nor will it do to say that we have done well enough in the past and are likely to do as well in the future.

Much to the point is the extract from the American Commonwealth by Hon. James Bryce, author, volume 2, pages 862 and 863:

Within the past decade new swarms of immigrants have invaded America, drawn from their homes in the eastern part of Europe by the constant cheapening of ocean transit, and by that more thorough drainage, so to speak, of the inland regions of Europe, which is due to the extension of railroads. These immigrants, largely of Slavonic race, come from a lower stratum of civilization than the German immigrant of the past, and since they speak foreign tongues are less quickly amenable to American influences and probably altogether less improvable than are the Irish. There seems to be a danger that if they continue to come in large numbers they may retain their own low standard of decency and comfort and menace the continuance among the working classes generally of that higher standard which has hitherto prevailed in all but a few spots in this country.

Certainly, Mr. President, a too rapid filling up of our country with foreign elements is sure to be at the expense of national character and Anglo-Saxon homogeneity, when such elements belong to the lowest classes in their own respective homes.

I have quoted frequently and at length from men who have been in a position to see the situation and have studied it and have suggested remedies.

Certainly, Mr. President, the country awaits the report of the commission that it may insist on legislation that will check this menace to our civilization; a menace that is obvious to all, except the steamship companies and the commission. Will the commission give us its report, or will it continue to pay high-priced professors and say nothing?

Mr. President, what will be the outcome of our unhappy condition only God in his infinite wisdom may know. But, sir, we should be warned by the teachings of history. We are told that fifteen hundred years ago Theodosius the Great induced large colonies to migrate from the countries from which a large portion of our immigration is now coming into the Roman Empire. They did not assimilate with the inhabitants of the empire. Patriotism decayed. The national spirit became extinct. The immigrants became a peril, and finally caused the downfall of the empire. Let us heed the lesson.

It has long been our boast that America offers an asylum for the oppressed of all nations, and Liberty Enlightening the World stands beckoning such to our shores. It is time, Mr. President, that this sentiment should be relegated to the limbo of things to be forgotten and give place to the more practical sentiment that our own must be provided for. How long, Mr. President, at the present rate, before the conditions here will be similar to what they are now in southeastern Europe? If we believe the evidence, the day is not far distant. Our bread lines are each day lengthening, and, if the newspapers are to be believed, the selling of human beings into slavery is a condition and not a theory. Well may we ponder, then, the warning words of Thomas Bailey Aldrich in the beautiful verses entitled "Unguarded Gates:"

Wide open and unguarded stand our gates,
And through them press a wild, a motley throng—
Men from the Volga and the Tartar steppes,
Featureless figures of the Hoang-Ho,
Malayan, Scythian, Teuton, Kelt, and Slav,
Flying the Old World's poverty and scorn;
These bringing with them unknown gods and rites,
Those tiger passions, here to stretch their claws.
In street and alley what strange tongues are these,
Accents of menace alien to our air,
Voices that once the tower of Babel knew!
O Liberty, White Goddess! is it well
To leave the gate unguarded? On thy breast
Fold Sorrow's children, soothe the hurts of fate,
Lift the downtrodden, but with the hand of steel
Stay those who to thy sacred portals come
To waste the gift of freedom. Have a care
Lest from thy brow the clustered stars be torn
And trampled in the dust. For so of old
The thronging Goth and Vandal trampled Rome,
And where the temples of the Cæsars stood
The lean wolf unmolested made her lair.

Mr. President, I desire to offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution which is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURROWS in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina offers a substitute for the pending resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That the Immigration Commission created by section 39 of an act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, approved February 20, 1907, be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate a summary of its doings and present work, together with a statement of its expenditures, the number of its employees, the capacity in which they are employed, the salaries paid and all allowances, and such other information as will give the Senate an idea of the amount of money and length of time which will be required for the commission to complete its labors and make its recommendations and final report.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, as a member of the commission mentioned in the resolution, I want to ask for the adoption of the resolution, that the commission may be able to lay before the Senate the information requested. I do this because the commission has been engaged in the investigation of every question that has been suggested by the Senator from South Carolina in his admirable address this morning, and is now engaged in the investigation not only of those, but of very many other questions; and I feel that when the work is completed it will be one which the Senate will appreciate as having value—information that is authentic and which has been secured from a scientific standpoint and which will materially aid Congress in legislating along these lines. In order that the Senate may know what the commission is doing, I really hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont a question before he resumes his seat.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FRAZIER. It was stated by the Senator from South Carolina in the course of his address that a certain person was employed in making an investigation along the border between Texas and Mexico, and that that person was receiving a salary of from $7,000 to $8,000 and traveling and other expenses.

I observe from the immigration act, under which the commission has been acting, that the President is authorized to appoint three commissioners and to fix their compensation, but I do not observe that the President is authorized to appoint anyone else. I ask the chairman of the commission who appointed the gentleman referred to and fixed his compensation?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not the papers before me at this time, and I can not speak with certainty. He was employed in connection with work conducted by Professor Jenks.

Mr. BAILEY. Employed on the secret-service force?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be very glad to make inquiries about that and see that a report is made.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator further——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. This debate is entirely out of order. I yielded for the Senator from South Carolina, but the post-office appropriation bill is really before the Senate. I must insist on the regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania demands the regular order.

Mr. WARREN. As conference reports are always in order, I will ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me.

Mr. PENROSE. I will yield for that purpose, but after that, in justice to the large number of gentlemen interested in the post-office appropriation bill who are here waiting for its consideration, I must insist that the Senate proceed with it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether, following the Senator from Wyoming, he will not allow me to proceed for five minutes upon this line of discussion?

Mr. TILLMAN subsequently said: Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. For what purpose?

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not consent to have the resolution which my colleague sent to the desk adopted?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. There is no objection whatever to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no objection to it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. There will be no debate.

Mr. PENROSE. Under the circumstances I yield.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GARY].

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

House concurrent resolution 67.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the conferees on the disagreements of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, be, and hereby are, authorized to take into consideration as if in disagreement the portion of the said bill relating to the salary of the Secretary of State, and also to report on any provision in relation to the law affecting said salary.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the resolution be agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 23464) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes, further insisting on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate thereto, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and accede to the request for a conference, the Vice-President to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Would it be in order to move that the Senate recede from its amendments increasing the salaries?

Mr. WARREN. There are in disagreement a great many matters besides that, and this covers them all.

Mr. BAILEY. So far as I am concerned, I should like myself to yield to the House disagreement to our amendments increasing those salaries, but as there are other matters in conference I will not insist on that at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WARREN, Mr. HEMENWAY, and Mr. TELLER.

MAJ. C. DE W. WILLCOX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of February 16, 1909 (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith Senate bill (S. 5989) authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Maj. C. De W. Wilcox decoration and diploma presented by Government of France.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1909.

Mr. BACON. In connection with the message just received from the President, I offer a concurrent resolution authorizing the enrollment of the bill.

The concurrent resolution (S. C. Res. 100) was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and of the Vice-President of the United States and President of the Senate in signing the enrolled bill (S. 5989) authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Maj. C. De W. Wilcox decoration and diploma presented by Government of France, be, and is hereby, rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the bill the word "Wilcox," in line 3 of the bill, is stricken out and the word "Willcox" substituted therefor; also amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Maj. C. De W. Willcox decoration and diploma presented by Government of France," so as to correctly spell the name of the prospective recipient, inaccurately stated in the bill.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6484) to establish postal savings banks for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask if the vote of the Senate taking up the post-office appropriation bill did not of itself displace the regular order existing when that vote was taken?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the motion had been made after the hour of 2 o'clock, the Chair is of opinion that it would, but having been made in the morning hour, the Chair is of opinion that it does not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the Senate proceed with the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether he will allow me to proceed for about five minutes upon the question discussed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GARY].

Mr. PENROSE. There is nothing before the Senate on that subject. We have just adopted the resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand, but I wish to say a few words upon the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada for five minutes.

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am sure we are all of us very much indebted to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GARY] for his very able and comprehensive speech regarding the most serious and important national problem of our time, the race question. We have to-day in our midst ten million of black people, manumitted about forty-five years ago, and suddenly and mistakenly admitted to an equality of political rights with us. We have the problem before us relating to that race, involving the question as to whether these rights, so improvidently granted, should not be either withdrawn or modified, involving the question as to whether the Nation in a cooperative and helpful, and not in an intrusive, way should aid the Southern States in the development of this infant race toward self-control, involving the question as to whether some form of assisted emigration of the blacks from our country should not be evolved that would diminish the existing dangers of race complications.

We have also a duty to perform to seven million brown people in distant islands, in whose favor we are called upon to discharge a sacred trust leading to ultimate independence.

We have confronting us in Europe three hundred million people of the white race, whose surplus population of those countries is eager to come to our shores. We have confronting us in Asia one billion people of the yellow and brown races, multitudes of whom desire to come to this country of unrivaled resources, of high wages, of agreeable climate, and abundant opportunities. We are thus called upon to face the race question in various forms.

My belief with reference to the black race now in our midst is that the time has come for the tolerant consideration of some form of national legislation that will recognize the national character of the problem, and whilst humane to the black race will be cooperative and helpful to the white race in their struggle for race integrity and supremacy.

So far as the immigration of foreign races of whatever color to this country is concerned, my belief is that it is purely a domestic question, to be settled by national legislation and not by diplomacy, and that, without mentioning or referring to any foreign race invidiously, we should declare by law that immigration to this country shall be restricted to the white race alone, except for the purposes of travel, education, and international trade, and that the immigration of the white race to this country shall be restricted to those whose physical constitution, character, and training will fit them ultimately for American citizenship.

This question has become a live question within the last few months by reason of the action of the legislatures of various States in the West, expressive of their realization of the danger of race complication. Upon this subject I have had some correspondence with the governor of my State, and have made a public statement regarding the form which the legislative expression of the States affected should take, and I ask that clippings from the Washington Post containing such matter be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Washington Post, February 5, 1909.]

THE JAPANESE QUESTION.

Letter of Hon. Francis G. Newlands to Governor Dickerson, of Nevada.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1909.

Hon. DENVER S. DICKERSON,
Carson City, Nev.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: With a view to moderating any action tending to create friction between Japan and this country, I take the liberty of suggesting to the legislature, through you, a plan of action which, whilst indicating a proper solicitude for relations of frendship and amity with Japan, will mark clearly our purpose to maintain this country as the home of the white race, free from such racial competition and antagonism on our own soil as will surely breed domestic violence and international hatred.

Entertaining no prejudice against any foreign race, and particularly admiring the vigor, courage, and patriotism of the people of Japan, and disposed to advance rather than to thwart her career of national greatness, we of the West are yet profoundly impressed with the view that the United States, possessing a vast territory as yet undeveloped and capable of supporting many times our present population, with natural resources unrivaled anywhere, with climates adapted to every people, will, with the cheapening of transportation, draw to itself the surplus population of all peoples.

Nature has classified the peoples of the world mainly under three colors—the white, the black, and the brown. Confronting us on the east lies Europe, with a total population of about 300,000,000 white people We are finding it difficult to assimilate even the immigrants of the white race from that Continent, and have been obliged to carefully restrict such immigration. We have drifted into a condition regarding the black race which constitutes the great problem and peril of the future. Confronting our Pacific coast lies Asia, with nearly a billion people of the brown race, who, if there were no restrictions, would quickly settle upon and take possession of our entire coast and intermountain region. History teaches that it is impossible to make a homogeneous people by the juxtaposition of races differing in color upon the same soil.

Race tolerance, under such conditions, means race amalgamation, and this is undesirable. Race intolerance means, ultimately, race war and mutual destruction, or the reduction of one of the races to servitude. The admission of a race of a different color, in a condition of industrial servitude, is foreign to our institutions, which demand equal rights to all within our jurisdiction. The competition of such a race would involve industrial disturbance and hostility, requiring the use of a large armed force to maintain peace and order, with the probability that the nation representing the race thus protected would never be satisfied that the means employed were adequate. The presence of the Chinese, who are patient and submissive, would not create as many complications as the presence of the Japanese, whose strong and virile qualities would constitute an additional factor of difficulty. Our friendship, therefore, with Japan, for whose territorial and race integrity the American people have stood in active sympathy in all her struggles, demands that this friendship should not be put to the test by bringing two such powerful races of such differing views and standards into industrial competition upon the same soil.

This can be prevented either by international treaty or by national laws regulating, restricting, or preventing immigration. International negotiation and treaty is, in my judgment, an unsatisfactory method. It requires a nation with which we have treaty relations to prevent its own people from going where they will, a restriction which we would never in any treaty apply to our own people. We would therefore be asking other nations to put a restriction upon the movements of their people which we would refuse to prescribe regarding our own. There is but one consistent position to assume, and that is to relegate the whole question to domestic legislation in each country, permitting each to make such laws regarding the regulation, restriction, or prevention of immigration as it sees fit. The time has come, in my judgment, when the United States, as a matter of self-protection and self-preservation, must declare by statutory enactment that it will not tolerate further race complications. Our country should by law, to take effect after the expiration of existing treaties, prevent the immigration into this country of all peoples other than those of the white race, except under restricted conditions relating to international commerce, travel, and education; and it should start immediately upon the serious consideration of a national policy regarding the people of the black race now within our boundaries which, with a proper regard for humanity, will minimize the danger to our institutions and our civilization.

Japan can not justly take offense at such action. She would be the first to take such action against the white race were it necessary to maintain the integrity of her race and her institutions. She is at liberty to pursue the same course. Such action constitutes no charge of inferiority against the race excluded; it may be a confession of inferiority in ability to cope economically with the excluded race. It involves no insult, or the possibility of war, for Japan could not possibly sustain a war, even were her finances in better condition than they are now, without the sympathy of the world as to the justness of her cause.

I give this utterance reluctantly, for I am not disposed to participate in the prevailing sensationalism; but the issue has been made; the public attention is called to the question; and failure upon the part of our western communities to meet it candidly and courageously might be regarded in the Eastern States, whose people are unfamiliar with the economic and social dangers attendant upon Asiatic immigration, to believe that we have abandoned our convictions and acquiesce in the view that a great question of national and domestic policy shall be turned over to the bargaining of diplomats. I am opposed to sporadic legislation, here and there, by the various States, intended to meet only certain phases of what constitutes a national peril, phases which will necessarily be covered by broad national legislation. I am opposed to terms of opprobrium and of insult. Japan deserves from us only respect and admiration; we deserve from her a proper regard for the integrity of our race and institutions. A temperate declaration made at this time by the legislatures of the Western States upon the lines here indicated will aid much to advance the enlightened, calm, and forceful presentation of this question in such a manner as shall convince the judgment of the world, including that of Japan herself. Thus, upon the expiration of the present treaty with Japan and without attendant attacks upon Japanese sensibilities, public opinion will be so shaped as to force a calm and rational solution of the question by purely domestic and national legislation.

Very sincerely, yours,

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

RACE SOLUTION IN LAW—SENATOR NEWLANDS URGES BROAD NATIONAL LEGISLATION—NOT MATTER FOR DIPLOMACY—NEVADA SENATOR SUGGESTS RESOLUTION.

Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, in a statement given out last night, asserted that there should be broad national legislation covering the whole Japanese question.

"The legislation proposed by the Pacific coast States intended to meet certain phases of what constitutes a national peril has been opposed by the President as involving violation of our treaty with Japan and imperiling her friendship," said Senator NEWLANDS.

"While the Western States will in all probability patriotically yield to such suggestion, there is danger that the abandonment of such legislation may be misunderstood by the Eastern States, whose people are unfamiliar with the economic and social dangers attendant upon Asiatic immigration, and that they may think that we acquiesce in the view that a great question of national and domestic policy should be turned over to the negotiation of diplomats. No question involving such important considerations as race homogeneity and domestic industrial peace can safely be turned over to diplomacy.

URGES BROAD LEGISLATION.

"There should be broad national legislation covering the whole question, and thus necessarily covering the parts of the question which state legislation in the West seeks to cover."

Continuing, the Senator stated that the Nevada legislature should, in his judgment, as a substitute for all pending measures, adopt resolutions making the following declarations:

"That the race question is now the most important question confronting the Nation; that already we have drifted regarding the black race into a condition which seriously suggests the withdrawal of the political rights heretofore mistakenly granted—the inauguration of a humane national policy which, with the cooperation and the aid of the Southern States, shall recognize that the blacks are a race of children, requiring guidance, industrial training, and the development of self-control, and other measures intended to reduce the danger of the race complication, formerly sectional, but now becoming national.

SITUATION ON ATLANTIC.

"That confronting us on the Atlantic is Europe, with a total population of 300,000,000 white people, whose surplus seeks outlet on our soil; that we have found it difficult to assimilate even the immigrants of the white race from that Continent and have been obliged by law to carefully restrict such immigration.

"That confronting us on the Pacific lies Asia, with a population of 1,000,000,000 people of the yellow and brown races, who, if unrestricted, would overwhelmingly immigrate to our country of unrivaled resources, of high wages, and almost unlimited capacity to support additional population; that preeminent among these people stands Japan—strong, aggressive, high-spirited, qualities which the American people admire, but which, if given play on American soil, would develop the strongest form of race antagonism.

CAN NOT ASSIMILATE RACES.

"That history teaches that it is impossible to develop a homogeneous people by the juxtaposition of races differing in color upon the same soil; that under such conditions race tolerance means an undesirable race amalgamation, and that race intolerance means ultimately race war, or the reduction of one of the races to servitude.

"That, therefore, our duty to our race and our institutions and the maintenance of friendship with races differing in color alike demand that we abandon the attempted adjustment of these questions by international treaty and pass a national law to take effect upon the expiration of existing treaties emphatically declaring that our country is open to white immigration alone; that such immigration shall be restricted to those of a constitution, character, and training that will ultimately fit them for American citizenship; and that other races shall be excluded from immigration except for purposes of trade, travel, and education."

NO GROUND FOR OFFENSE.

Senator NEWLANDS adds that dignified legislative action of this kind could not be made the ground of offense by any nation affected; that Japan herself would be the first to take similar action were the integrity of her race and her institutions threatened; that the United States always had been friendly to Japan in her struggles to maintain and protect her territorial and racial integrity; and that such action was entirely consistent with absolute friendliness between the nations.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. The regular order, Mr. President.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to page 3, line 16.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was not able to follow the reading of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary is reading at line 16, on page 3.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did the Secretary read all of page 2?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He read all the original matter on that page, not the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to the new provision at the bottom of page 2. Is that the same as in the old law? There was a provision in reference to that subject last year. What change is made in this provision?

Mr. PENROSE. I would suggest that the formal reading of the bill be gone through with. That is what was demanded.

Mr. BURKETT. I did not understand that.

Mr. PENROSE. We will then take up the bill for the consideration of committee amendments and such other amendments as may be submitted.

Mr. BURKETT. I beg pardon; I thought the Secretary was reading the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The text of the bill is being read. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the amendments to the bill reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The first amendment is on page 2. I ask the Secretary to read that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 16, it is proposed, by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to insert the following amendment:

For per diem allowance of inspectors in the field while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster-General, not to exceed $4 per day, $325,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, allow inspectors per diem while temporarily located at any place on business away from their home or their designated domicile for a period not exceeding twenty consecutive days at any one place and make rules and regulations governing the foregoing provisions relating to per diem: And provided further, That no per diem shall be paid to inspectors receiving annual salaries of $2,000 or more.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this amendment and the one on page 3, beginning on line 12, are simply a transfer of two paragraphs which were in the bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, and which paragraphs are to be found on page 31 of the bill. They are existing law, and got into the bill in the House of Representatives in the wrong place on account of a point of order being raised against them. They went out of the bill and were subsequently put in on the floor of the House, when it was discovered they were existing law. Therefore they are no alteration of the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I rose, hearing the bill for the first time, to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question in reference to this section jointly with the section on page 22. I observe that, in speaking, he stated that the paragraph which has just been read is the old law. What provision has the committee made for, and does the provision on page 22, in conjunction with this, give allowance for expenses to railway postal clerks while absent from home on duty?

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire an answer now, or would he prefer to wait until later?

Mr. BURKETT. I would say to the Senator that I am going to be called out for a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture, there being a hearing before that committee on the agricultural appropriation bill.

I am interested in the matter of the expenses of railway postal clerks while they are absent from home. The amendment on page 22 would seem to cover that matter, but the amount seems to me to be too small. I would ask the Senator if that is intended to cover the matter—if the committee has given it consideration, and with what result?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the committee made an effort to cover the situation referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, and an amendment was introduced by me in the Senate, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $2,000,000: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1909, railway postal clerks shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling expenses, not to exceed $1 per day, while away from the terminal where their runs or series of runs begin and end, when actually on duty, such expenses to be paid under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, that amendment would cover the situation concerning which the Senator makes his inquiry. Almost every member of the Post-Office Committee was anxious to provide for this very meritorious class of employees. There can be no argument against the equity and justice of granting this per diem allowance.

It was thought, however, Mr. President, that the fact that this allowance at the present time would add nearly $2,000,000 to this appropriation bill, and that other amendments, likewise looking to the relief of conditions among the employees of the Post-Office Department, would add five or six million dollars more, with a deficit in the Post-Office Department for this year of some $15,000,000, and an estimated deficit of $25,000,000 for the approaching fiscal year, it was not reasonable to expect or practical to incorporate this very meritorious provision in the bill at this time.

The proposed amendment was referred by the committee to the Postmaster-General, and I ask the Secretary to read his reply.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1909.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of the 4th instant, transmitting an amendment intended to be proposed by yourself to the bill (H. R. 26305) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, etc., and requesting my opinion regarding its merits, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

The first part of the proposed amendment covers the provision of law incorporated in the existing and preceding appropriation bills for a number of years, authorizing the payment of actual and necessary expenses of division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and railway postal clerks while actually traveling on business of the department and away from their several designated headquarters, and in the latter part a further provision, which has not yet been incorporated in any bill which has become law, for paying railway postal clerks their actual and necessary traveling expenses, not to exceed $1 per day, while away from the terminals where their runs, or series of runs, begin and end, when actually on duty.

With reference to the provision first referred to, I have called your particular attention to it by my letter of the 4th instant, and asked that the paragraph covering it, which went out of the bill on a point of order during its consideration in the House, be restored. This provision is necessary for the proper administration of the service and has been carried for a number of years.

With reference to the second, that is, the proposal to pay railway postal clerks their traveling expenses while on their runs, I recommended in my annual report to Congress the careful consideration of the same "as soon as the postal revenues justify." In my letter to you of the 4th instant, advising you with reference to the amendment intended to be proposed by Senator BURROWS, and which has the same object as the amendment under consideration, although it is there proposed in the form of an increase in salaries, I stated that I am unable to indorse at this time the provision of any amendment providing for increase in salaries in the postal service, and gave my reasons therefor. While the amendment which you propose does not provide for this increase as increase in salary, the effect of it is substantially the same, so far as the reasons are concerned, which prevent me from giving it my approval, namely, the state of the revenues. Therefore, in view of the probable amount of the deficit in the postal revenues for the coming year, I can not at this time give the amendment my approval.

Faithfully, yours,

G. V. L. MEYER.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to state further to the Senator that there is no more sincere friend of the class of employees affected by the proposed amendment that I am. I recognize the dangers of their employment, the high qualifications they must possess, the vast and extensive knowledge they must have to sort the letters in the railway cars and to attend to the complicated and multitudinous duties of their occupation; but it is obvious that we can not borrow money to raise salaries. A presentation of the condition of the Post-Office Department for this year and for the approaching year is a sufficient answer to any proposition involving a salary increase of $2,000,000 in this case, and some seven or eight million dollars additional, making $10,000,000 more, over and above the impending deficit.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will say in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, understanding, as I have, that the membership of the committee were very favorably disposed to this particular amendment, I had expected or, in fact, understood until quite recently that this kind of an amendment would be recommended. Had it been otherwise, I should have been prepared to bring in some figures and some comparisons of salaries and have tried to show to the Senate the merits of this particular amendment.

In general, as Senators will bear me out, I have not been very much disposed to favor salary increases. My record in that particular is pretty straight. I voted against all of the recent salary increases, and, in fact, against the increase of my own salary. But it has seemed to me for a long time that there has been practiced an injustice to the railway mail clerks in comparison with almost all other government employees.

I think we have not a more efficient body of employees or a harder working body of employees in all the government service than the railway mail clerks. Their hours are long; their duties are arduous; their work is exacting; their risk of life and of limb is very great. They are required to be away from home a great deal of the time, and, so far as I can now recall, they are practically the only government employees required to be away from home by their service for whom we make no allowance for expenses.

Of course it may be answered in some particulars that the salary compensates for it; but, as I said in the beginning, the salary of the railway mail clerk is not adequate to compensate for it. In fact, the salary to start with is very small. They are about the smallest salaries that the Government pays for the kind of service and the degree of service which it requires of these clerks. In fact, as a Senator suggests to me, it is the smallest salary the Government pays for any kind of service. Those clerks are the poorest paid to start with. They are required to be away from home, and we make no provision for their expenses.

It has occurred to me that the time has come when we ought to do justice to them. We require much of them. Their work is both manual and mental. I have at times looked over some of the examinations they are required to take; I have investigated somewhat the amount of preparation they have to undergo for their work; and I undertake to say that there is not an employee in the government service, from the very highest to the lowest, in all the category of public servants who is called upon continually to be studying for their work. Ever so often they must pass examinations, and in preparation for it must be always at work, always at study. When they get one State studied up, they have to study up another State, and then study up groups of States. In fact, they have to study all the while to prepare themselves for their work. They do it; and it seems to me Congress could well afford to remedy this matter at the present time.

Of course we are all proud of the mail service. It is the particular part of our governmental service that we take pride in. The work is most efficient, and the men are of a very high order. By their industry and faithfulness and application they have made it the great success that it is. No private business is handled so efficiently as the railway mail clerk performs his service. We want it to be such; we require it to be such; and we want to keep it such. We require these men to prepare themselves for efficient service, and we ought to encourage them by more than words. It seems to me it is unjust to go on, year after year, without providing for taking care of their expenses when they are away from home. I may say also that the country appreciates this, for I have had many letters and resolutions from commercial clubs urging an increase in their salaries by way of this expense allowance.

I realize the strength of the argument which the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests; I realize that it is going to cost, perhaps, a million or two million dollars to pay the expenses; and I appreciate the condition of the Treasury. However, we increased salaries here the other day without much concern, apparently; salaries, too, which, in my judgment, were not entitled to be increased as much as the salaries of the men in the Railway Mail Service. We increased the salaries of men who were getting up into the thousands of dollars. We increased them on the theory that those men, or some of them, were cut off from the opportunities of private life, from engaging in commercial pursuits—in short, from making money. That was a very effective argument, I confess, although I did not vote for the increases. But, Mr. President, I should like to know where there is anybody more cut off from commercial pursuits, who is more taken away from the affairs of everyday life, who is more cut off from any possibility of making money for their old age, who is more deprived of all such opportunity—in short, who is more a slave to his work, than the railway mail clerk.

For one I do not quite share the conservatism of the committee in this particular. Yet I am not one, as I have said, who wants to go headlong increasing salaries. I am for this because I think it is right. We must give concern to our Treasury. But it seems to me we ought to distinguish between justice and extravagance. If the Post-Office Department is running behind, there is something wrong with the Post-Office Department, either in its management or because we are not charging enough for the service. We can not afford to keep salaries down improperly or unjustly in order to make up deficiencies in the Post-Office Department. We ought to pay living and just salaries, sufficient to take care of the employees, and we should charge the traffic enough to sustain it, or else we ought to reorganize the service so as to cut down expenses somewhere else.

I am not going to criticise in any way the Post-Office Department, because I do not know of any place that is particularly vulnerable at this moment. I suspect there are some places where more money is spent than is necessary, but we all know the government service is not perfect. It perhaps never will be perfect. We will never be able to run the Post-Office Department with as little expense as a private individual, perhaps, could run it. There will always be some place open to assault. But yet I undertake to say that if the price we charge is enough, then there is extravagance somewhere which ought to be cut out, because when you charge enough for a service which is as large as the post-office service and as comprehensive and as extensive, it ought to warrant paying the people who do the work an honest, fair wage.

I am about to be called out of the Chamber to attend a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture. I shall try to get back by the time this paragraph on page 22 is reached, which I see is just the same in the first part as the amendment the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced; and if the Senator from Pennsylvania or somebody else does not introduce the amendment, I am going to offer the rest of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania to this amendment on page 22, and test the Senate and take its judgment upon allowing to the railway mail clerks their necessary expenses when absent from home and on duty. As I have said, I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania, who introduced the amendment, and who, as he says, is very friendly to it, may deem it proper to offer it, if not as a committee amendment, then as an individual amendment to the committee amendment. But if he does not, I will offer the rest of that amendment as an amendment to the committee amendment, so that it will be just as the Senator introduced it originally, taking advantage of his knowledge and information on the subject as to its being drawn properly and in the right form and manner.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has made the statement he has and has raised this point. I entirely concur in his views as to the meritorious claims of this particular class of employees. I think, however, it ought to be borne in mind that the House bill has made provision for a considerable increase in the $1,300 grade. On page 3 of the House report on the post-office appropriation the Senator will read:

> Ample provision has also been made to equalize the pay of railway postal clerks now employed in the $1,200 grade on apartment-car service upon lines where full railway post-office car service is also in operation by promotion of such clerks to the $1,300 grade.

As I understand, that provision of the House will affect and secure a promotion from $1,200 to $1,300 a year for about 600 employees of the Railway Mail Service, the total number of such employees being a little over 15,000. This makes an increase in the amount of that item over last year, as already provided for in the House, of $877,300 especially for this class of employees.

I am informed that when the bill was pending in the House committee the committee was willing to increase the salaries of all the employees in the Railway Mail Service actually engaged away from home by $50, and the amendment of the Senator from Michigan offered in this body provides for an increase of salary of $100. Neither proposition was acceptable to the railway mail clerks. They preferred to have no increase whatever unless they could get what is known as the "per diem allowance." So it must be borne in mind that the House has added very considerably to this bill at the present session in favor of these employees and that the proposition which was made was not acceptable.

As far as I am concerned, I shall be only too glad at another session, in a better condition of the postal revenues, to cooperate to the fullest extent with the Senator from Nebraska in placing the relations of these employees with the department upon a satisfactory basis.

Mr. BURKETT. In reply to the Senator, I call attention to how very small, after all, this raise is. Less than 4 per cent of the clerks have been raised less than 10 per cent. In short, it has simply been an outlet for those in the lower grade who have been entitled to promotion, which is very small, after all, and does not meet the other 96 per cent who are still more in need of it, because many of them are getting still less salary and have no allowance for their expenses when they are away from home.

Mr. PENROSE. I admit it is not substantial, but it shows a disposition to relieve the situation.

Mr. BURKETT. I am willing to admit that the disposition is very good, but, of course, the disposition does not pay the bills of these employees when they are away from home. This little raise, as to 4 per cent, does not affect the great 96 per cent of them, most of whom, I say, get smaller salaries, and whose expenses are just the same as those getting higher salaries.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to remind the Senator of the fact that only 50 per cent of these employees are away from home or would be able to take advantage of the per diem allowance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator in charge of the bill to say that the reason the committee did not incorporate in the bill his amendment just read, in reference to the per diem of mail clerks, was the condition of the Treasury. I should like to ask the Senator if that was the only reason why the amendment was not incorporated in the bill?

Mr. PENROSE. If the postal revenues would permit it, I do not know of any amendment that I would vote for more readily, as far as I am concerned, than this per diem allowance.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BURKETT. As I have to go out of the Chamber, I should like to offer the rest of the amendment, so that it may be pending, if the Senator will permit me. Then I can leave the Chamber. I realize that it is out of order, because we have not reached the point where it would be appropriate—page 22. I should like to offer the amendment and have it pending, if there is no objection.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment at the present time.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after line 4, in place of the amendment of the committee at that point, it is proposed to insert:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $2,000,000: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1909, railway postal clerks shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling expenses, not to exceed $1 per day, while away from the terminal where their runs or series of runs begin and end, when actually on duty, such expenses to be paid under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be regarded as pending and will be considered when the committee amendment is reached.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, like the Senator who has just occupied the floor, I have to leave the Chamber to attend a meeting of a committee; and if it will not interrupt the arrangement the Senator from Pennsylvania has in mind, I should like to ask him now, in advance of reaching that part of the bill, one or two questions with reference to the salaries of other post-office employees.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator if I am able.

Mr. SIMMONS. I observe that the bill as it came to us from the House provided for an increase in the salary of 50 per cent of the clerks and carriers in first-class offices.

Mr. PENROSE. On that point I intend to offer an amendment to reduce it to the present law.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee does not report in favor of incorporating that provision.

Mr. PENROSE. That was an oversight in reporting the bill, the only one, I believe; and I have been directed by the committee to report an amendment reducing those clerks and restoring existing conditions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then there will be no increase, so far as the committee's action is concerned, in the salaries of clerks and employees in first-class offices?

Mr. PENROSE. There will not be.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the bill came to us from the House, the salary of 50 per cent of the clerks in second-class offices—not carriers, but clerks—was increased. Does the committee retain that provision of the House, thereby increasing the salary of the clerks in second-class offices?

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senator's inquiry was regarding clerks in first-class offices.

Mr. SIMMONS. My first inquiry was as to clerks and carriers in first-class offices.

Mr. PENROSE. That was provided for last year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I am asking the Senator with regard to clerks and carriers in second-class offices, because I understood the action of the House raised the salaries of clerks in second-class offices, but did not raise the salaries of the carriers.

Mr. PENROSE. In second-class offices?

Mr. SIMMONS. In second-class offices.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that is right. I intend to offer an amendment to put the clerks back to the existing condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that there will be no increase in the salary?

Mr. PENROSE. Not if the Senate adopts my amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not in first or second class offices?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; in first-class offices, because that was provided for at the last session of Congress, and the pending bill does not affect in any way the conditions existing under the law already in force regarding first-class offices.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand. Under the general classification act there are certain automatic promotions which regulate themselves. The question I ask the Senator now is, Does the bill make any increase in the salary of these clerks not already provided for by existing law?

Mr. PENROSE. I can assure the Senator, so far as I have information or as far as I can read the bill, that there is no change in the condition of first-class post-offices, either as regards the grade, salary, or promotion of clerks or carriers, other than that already existing and provided for in the last post-office appropriation act. The only change made in relation to the clerical force is in second-class offices.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the failure to make this increase as provided in the bill as it came to us is on account of the condition of the Treasury?

Mr. PENROSE. I propose to offer an amendment to strike it out.

Mr. SIMMONS. To strike out the increase made by the House?

Mr. PENROSE. To strike out the increase made by the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is that on account of the condition of the Treasury?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. Just a word, Mr. President, with the Senator's permission.

The Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in my judgment, has been very considerate of the railway mail clerks. During the last session of Congress the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads inserted——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that we are not talking about railway mail clerks at this particular time.

Mr. CLAY. I understand.

During the last session of Congress the committee added an item of over a million dollars for the purpose of paying the expenses of railway mail clerks when away from home, and that item went to conference and was defeated in conference by the House conferees. It is true that at this session the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads added, I believe, a little over $6,000,000 to the bill—an item of $2,000,000 to pay the expenses of railway mail clerks when away from home and an item of a little over $4,000,000 to increase the salaries of the rural free-delivery carriers.

Mr. President, when we began to add the increases and saw the condition of the post-office appropriation bill, we found that the bill carried $6,000,000 more than the estimates made by the different offices of the department. The Postmaster-General came to us and said that the condition of the Treasury at this time was such that it was impossible to allow those amendments without creating a deficit of over $20,000,000 in the Post-Office Department revenue during the next year, and the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads got together, reconsidered their action, and determined to strike off every single one of those amendments and the increase made by the House. Consequently this bill comes from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads without any increase, except between fifty and sixty thousand dollars, as I understand.

It is true that the House increased a certain number of clerks in the first-class offices, but the committee unanimously adopted an amendment, and the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, as I understand, will offer it at the proper time, reducing them, and it will probably be adopted without any opposition.

We realized that while these amendments were meritorious, and while we were exceedingly anxious to adopt a part of them, it became the duty of Congress to examine critically the financial situation in regard to affairs in our country and to make appropriations accordingly; and we might just as well realize that if the receipts continue to fall off monthly as they are falling off at this time, in eleven months from to-day there will not be a dollar of surplus in the Treasury of the United States.

We had in the Treasury twelve months ago a surplus of over $250,000,000, I think. I understand that your total surplus at the present time will amount to about $130,000,000, and I have been informed—it is true the Secretary of the Treasury has not said so to me, but I have been informed from sources I can not question—that the Treasury Department is alarmed to-day at the situation, believing that in less than twelve calendar months, instead of there being a surplus, we will have to raise more money than we are producing at the present time. We may just as well realize that that is true beyond question.

The tariff has to be revised during the extra session of Congress, and it will probably take five or six months to revise it. You can not hope to have it done at an earlier day. Observation and study convince me that during the time you are changing the tariff schedules, fixing lower or higher rates, undoubtedly your customs dues will fall off.

You can not expect to receive so much money by reason of customs dues the year you are revising the tariff as you probably will receive afterwards. It is naturally true that merchants and importers buying goods and bringing them into this country will wait upon Congress and see how you revise the tariff before they go to foreign countries and buy goods.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads simply got together and determined to cut off these expenditures this year, because we did not have the money to pay for them. Any business man who thoroughly understands his business will never continue to pay out more money than he is making. He will change his business methods so as to make receipts and expenditures correspond. The House committee made the bill $400,000 larger than the estimates, and if we had insisted upon our amendments it would have been nearly $7,000,000 larger than the estimates.

Something has been said about the Post-Office Committee rushing this matter through. We met last Monday for the purpose of considering this bill. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that we ought to consider thoroughly every appropriation bill, but in legislating I have always found that you must take the practical side of questions. I do not know how we can give a week or four or five days to every one of the appropriation bills from now on. If we do, we will be able to pass but a few more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am a little surprised at the information the Senator from Georgia gives the Senate with respect to the first meeting of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for the consideration of this bill. He says it was last Monday. That, I believe, would make the first meeting some thirteen days after the committee received the bill. I do not like to criticise at all, but as a Member of this body I just want to get a fair chance to look at the making of this legislation, appropriating more than $200,000,000 of the people's money.

It seems to me if the committee had met with reasonable promptness after receiving the appropriation bill from the House and had considered it, it might have been reported ten days ago. Then there would have been no call to put it through under the committee whip. There would then have been ample time to read it before being compelled to vote upon its provisions.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLAY. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PENROSE. Of course when a bill comes to the Senate from the House it is necessary to do a good deal of preliminary work. Not a moment was lost, I can assure the Senator. Amendments proposed had to be referred to the department, replies received, and a great deal of preliminary work had to be done outside of that studious attention which was probably personally given by every member of the committee before the committee met to the documents relating to the bill, which the Senator from Wisconsin admits he has never read up to the present time.

I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there are 10 appropriation bills pending before this body at the present time. We have after to-day, eleven legislative days on which to transact business. One of those, Saturday, the 27th instant, is practically reserved for memorial proceedings; another day is set aside for the discussion of the Brownsville affair, leaving nine days for 10 appropriation bills. In addition to that, there are three conferences in session, one over the naval appropriation bill and two others—the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I believe, and the legislative appropriation bill. Those conferences have to make reports to this body and to the other branch of Congress, and it is a safe prediction that some of them may lead to prolonged debate.

Therefore, when the Senator from Wisconsin asks to have bills go over in this way, so that he may have an opportunity to read the measure or familiarize himself with it, a slight inspection of the business of the Senate in the last ten days of the Congress must convince any Senator that such a suggestion is impracticable and could not be for a moment considered.

It is not the fault of the Senate that this is the condition. It is the fault of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that on the 4th of March next this Congress shall go out of existence. It is not the fault of the Senate that these bills do not get here until a late period in the session. It is owing to the fact they have to be first introduced in the House, referred to their appropriate committees, and be duly considered. I have frequently thought it was a mistake that they come here so late, and that a full consideration of them is often impossible. That is particularly true of the river and harbor bill, which on more than one occasion has been defeated on that account, and which on more than one occasion has failed to include meritorious items that ought to have been in the bill simply because it was impossible by reason of the expiration of the Congress on the 4th of March to have them considered.

I think a dispassionate view of the subject will convince every Senator that it is impossible unduly to prolong the consideration of these bills, and that if there is any Senator who desires to render himself perfectly familiar with the subject he owes it at least to the Senate to have spent some time up to the present in familiarizing himself with the matters contained in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just to say one word, Mr. President. I certainly do not want to discuss this subject with any feeling. I believe that the business of this great body and of the other branch of Congress can be transacted under the Constitution with deliberation within the time fixed by the Constitution for that purpose. My observation since I have been a Member of this body is that the appropriation bills get in here about as late for the long session as they do for the short session. It simply seems to be a part of a system which prevails that these most important legislative acts shall have little consideration. If these bills arrive from the other branch of Congress so late that there is not time to give them adequate consideration, and if, because of this, the appropriation bills should fail, the responsibility for such failure would rest upon the other branch.

This is a coordinate branch of the Congress and is entitled to a reasonable time to consider legislation, whether it be appropriation bills or bills of any other character.

It should not be forgotten, Mr. President, that these appropriation bills are made the vehicle for new legislation that ought to have consideration independent of appropriations. Under the rules of the Senate, as construed by the Senate, whenever the Senate by vote chooses so to construe them, it is possible to put almost any legislation on appropriation bills. This construction of the rules by vote of the Senate to permit the enactment of general legislation on an appropriation bill in one case is often entirely inconsistent with the vote of the Senate in another case. The rules are made and unmade at will. In this way it is possible to put through legislation here that could never pass this body if brought up and considered on its merits as an independent measure. If the increases in salaries incorporated in one of the appropriation bills here, aggregating something more, as I now remember, than half a million dollars, raising the salaries of the Vice-President and of the Speaker of the House from $12,000 to $15,000 per year, and raising the salaries of the members of the Cabinet and the federal judiciary in a like proportion—if those propositions had been considered independently and upon their merits, in my opinion they could not have passed this body.

I am certain that Senators who have made a careful study of the rules of the Senate and whose opinions are heeded here expressed the belief that the construction put upon the rules by the Senate in order to incorporate that provision in the appropriation bill and put it through was forced because the appropriation bill was behind it. A freer expression of their opinion would have been that the Senate rules were violated in order to put that legislation through. Indeed, I now happen to remember that the Senator from Maine rose in his place and said that in voting for the proposition he did not vote that the legislation put upon an appropriation bill was proper under the rules, but that he took the latitude which he felt he had a right to take to vote for it for other reasons.

Mr. President, I am not going to offer any defense to the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania that I did not give sufficient attention to an examination of this bill before it was reported to the Senate. I might say, if we were indulging in that sort of a discussion here, that if the chairman of this great committee had been in attendance upon the Senate for a number of days his committee might have been brought together for an earlier consideration of the bill, and then Senators would have been given an opportunity after it was reported to learn its provisions and to study it with some care.

But I propose, Mr. President, to insist from time to time upon the importance and the necessity of having these appropriation bills earlier, and to insist as a right as a Member of this body on a fair opportunity to examine them after they are reported from the committees and we know what they are to be.

I shall exercise my right as a Member of the Senate in no dilatory tactics further than to insure the opportunity to make some reasonable investigation of bills after they are reported. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and to the chairmen of committees charged with other appropriation bills that we sometimes make haste slowly by being unreasonable. I asked for one day in which to look at this great bill. I know that I voiced the wishes of many Senators on this floor when I made that request. I believe that much time spent in useless debate might have been saved if that request had been granted.

Men who are asked to vote for these great propositions with their eyes shut and who are not disposed to do it are obliged, because they are in the dark with respect to the subject-matter, to ask a great many questions, inducing debate and prolonging it, when it would not be necessary if they could have a reasonable opportunity to examine the bill.

I was obliged to leave the floor in order to avail myself of the time to make such investigation as I could, and was denied the privilege of hearing the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. GARY], to whom the Senator from Pennsylvania yielded very readily, and very properly, too. I did not have an opportunity to hear the remarks that the Senator submitted upon a subject of very great importance to the country. I at once put myself in communication with the Post-Office Department in an effort to secure information which I am entitled to have, and which I was informed could not be furnished to me immediately upon call.

I want to say—and I say it in the right spirit, too—with respect to the other appropriation bills, it is not necessary, for my benefit, to read the list of those which remain to be passed every time debate is asked on an appropriation bill. And I say further to those in charge of these bills, you will make more progress with the business of this session if you will report the bills out and give reasonable opportunity—a day, at least—for Senators to get acquainted with their provisions.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I am about through and I know time is valuable. I believe the Senate will bear me out that during the twelve years I have been here I have never taken the floor yet for the purpose of killing time. I have been a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads for nearly twelve years—it will be twelve years the 4th of next March—and I do not think I have ever missed more than one meeting of that committee.

Now, I do not agree with the Senator who has just taken his seat that there is ample time during this short session of Congress to discuss at length the appropriation bills.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Georgia does not quote me correctly.

Mr. CLAY. I do not desire to misquote the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not say to discuss at length all these appropriation bills, or to discuss at length, necessarily, any of them, but to investigate them and to determine what debate would be beneficial to this body and the country upon each one of them.

Mr. CLAY. I say I doubt if we have the time during the short session of Congress to thoroughly investigate and to discuss the different appropriation bills.

I will tell you another thing. My observation has been that, at either the short or the long session of Congress, these bills are largely made up by the respective committees to which they have been referred. We have 14 appropriation bills. We have 80 working days in a short session of Congress. If you take 14 and divide it into 80, it gives only 5 working days and a fraction for every appropriation bill, leaving out all other legislation. I believe the time will come—and it has come now—in the history of this country when Congress ought to change its session. I do not believe that we ought to confine the short session of Congress from the 1st of December to the 4th day of March. We ought to meet in January and remain in session six months, so as to have ample time to thoroughly consider these appropriation bills and the needs of the country.

So far as I am concerned, there has not been a day in fifteen days that I have not attended a committee meeting, and I presume other Senators are situated the same way. Take the Committee on Appropriations; take the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and other committees; they have to convene with a view and purpose of considering their work without conflicting with each other——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not attended committee meetings every day for fifteen days, Mr. President; and there are other Members of this body who have not been called upon to do so. I have attended the meetings of the committees of which I am a member. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, and to other Senators, that if there was a little different distribution of the committee service here the burdens of a few of the Senators would not be quite so heavy. There are about seven committees that transact all the business of this body, and some fifty-odd Senators are not members at all, who are assigned to the important duty of Standards, Weights, and Measures, or the Investigation of the Potomac River Front, or the Expenditures in the Agricultural Department, a committee which, I think, has never had a meeting.

A majority of the Senators in this body are assigned to committees that are not transacting the important business of the legislation which is now pressing for consideration. I will not trench further on the time of the Senator.

Mr. CLAY. Go ahead.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a subject that I will recur to from time to time during the remainder of this session. I will not take more of the Senator's time now. I thank him for yielding.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I can not say all I want to say this morning. I know the time of the Senate is precious. So far as I am concerned, I believe we ought to get through during this session every single appropriation bill, and I believe that when the extra session of Congress is convened we ought to consider nothing except tariff legislation, and to consider it thoroughly in the least possible time. I believe that the American people ought to know at the earliest practicable day what are the schedule rates fixed, in order that business may adjust itself. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to arrange those schedules and to make such substantial revisions as justice and the best interests of the country demand at the earliest practicable and possible day. I do not believe that a more serious danger could threaten the business interests of this country than to sit here eight or ten months and discuss tariff schedules before they are fixed. The manufacturers and the farmers and the business interests of this great country want to know at the earliest possible day what Congress is going to do in regard to the tariff, and so believing I believe it to be the duty of Congress to pass every one of these appropriation bills, if we can possibly do so, at this session of Congress. Hereafter change the time of the meeting of Congress. The country has outgrown these short sessions of Congress, and the business interests of the country demand that Congress shall convene in January and remain in session for six months, so as to have these appropriation bills thoroughly considered, and all other legislation necessary for the best interest of the country. The appropriation bills do not receive that careful attention their importance demands at the short session of Congress.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the extra session is going to be a very important one. No legislation could be of greater concern to the business interests of the country than the legislation which will be dealt with at that time. But I hope that the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia that that legislation is to be put through on "greased ways" will not materialize when the session comes.

Mr. CLAY. I did not catch the Senator's remark.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I used a figure of speech that the great tariff bill should not be put through on a greased runway.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Georgia never insisted upon any such proposition. The Senator from Georgia insisted that the tariff ought to be honestly and thoroughly revised, as the best interests of the country demand, at the earliest possible day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But he suggested a time limit for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Wisconsin does not desire to misquote me. I did not fix any time. I said we ought to consume the necessary time to revise the tariff thoroughly and to the best interests of the country, and that we ought to work continuously for the purpose of accomplishing those results without any delay.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no desire to misquote the Senator from Georgia. I understood him to name some months within which that bill ought to be disposed of. But be that as it may, I hope to see the tariff bill, when it comes over to this body from the House, where it will originate, thoroughly discussed paragraph by paragraph.

However, Mr. President, the Senate will not be able to take up the debate upon the tariff bill until it receives the bill from the House. I do not conceive that it would be such a terrible calamity to this country if the proper consideration of some appropriation bill should carry it over to the extra session. Legislative committees would then have to be appointed, and bills now in committees and on the calendar which have not been able to get any consideration here, for one reason or another, could then receive consideration.

Mr. President, we are having the old experience over and over again. At the beginning of every session resolutions are introduced. They are discussed and legislation waits. We give over the time of the Senate and the time of the House through the early part of the session to unimportant matters, and it seems sometimes to an observer for the very purpose of consuming time and preventing the consideration of business for which the people of this country wait, and wait in vain. Then, all the latter part of the session is taken up with the appropriation bills, to the exclusion of everything else.

We never hear any complaint from the Senators who control the order of business here because of this waste of time at the beginning of the session. They then let debate take its course. It goes on and on, day after day, week after week, productive of nothing but talk—talk that serves to prevent the consideration of measures that have waited a quarter of a century for the attention of Congress.

It was just such methods that for nine years prevented the consideration of the amendment to the interstate-commerce act, after the decision in the maximum-rate case. The Interstate Commerce Commission appealed to Congress for an amendment to restore to them the power to determine what reasonable rates should be.

It was not until public opinion finally gathered volume and strength enough to make itself felt here. After nine years of persistent appeal from the Interstate Commerce Commission, and after the President of the United States, in three successive messages, had urged the consideration of these repeated recommendations of the commission—I say it was not until after nine years of that sort of thing; nay, more than that, it was not until after a national association had been formed by the business men of this country, leading shippers, and leading merchants——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Organized into—I do not yield for just a moment; I will yield in a few moments——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I wanted to ask the Senator whether this was the lecture he has been recently giving? It has a familiar sound. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator does not gain any time by interruptions or observations of that sort. It has a familiar sound, and it will have a more familiar sound, I will say to him.

When the legislation that was urged as a public necessity, I say, by the great Interstate Commerce Commission, created by this body, clothed by this body not only with the power but having the obligation imposed upon them at each session of Congress to report to Congress what legislation the country needed with respect to railway rate regulation—I say, after nine years of their appeal, and after three successive annual messages from the President of the United States urging that legislation—it took the organization of a national association of business men, maintaining here at the capital a strong organization, to appeal to the representatives of the people to do the business of the people that the country demanded, before any pretense was made to legislate upon the subject.

The same is true as to other important measures. It took seventeen years of organized national effort to put through Congress a pure-food law to protect the lives and the homes of this country. For forty years the Postmasters-General have recommended, when they have touched the subject at all, the establishment of postal savings banks.

Mr. President, I only want to say this in conclusion: We will get along faster with these appropriation bills if we are given a little time to look them over after they have been reported from the committees. So far as I am concerned, there will be no factious or obstructive tactics pursued if that opportunity is afforded. That is all I ask.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I shall not sit silent in my seat while misstatements are made or claptrap statesmanship is attempted. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has been criticised by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the method of selecting committees has likewise been criticised by him.

I make the statement, without fear of contradiction, that he has been on the Committee on the Census during his service in this Senate and has failed to attend a single meeting of that committee. I make the statement, without fear of contradiction, that he is on the Committee on Claims, and has only attended once or twice in all his service a meeting of that committee, and that attendance was only to bring up some trivial claims bill. I make the statement, without fear of contradiction, that he has been, until recently, on the Committee on Pensions, a committee holding and considering one of the largest appropriation bills pending before Congress every year, and that, according to the unanimous testimony of all his colleagues on that committee, regardless of party, he has hardly ever attended a session of that committee. I make the statement, without fear of contradiction from him or any other Senator, because the statement is confirmed by the testimony of every member of the committee, regardless of party, that on the important Committee on Indian Affairs, considering every year a most important appropriation bill, important to his constituents and to the great western country, he has seldom been present and has never rendered useful service thereon; and that while he indicates this craving for future committee assignments, he is already on two committees with appropriation bills, and pays no attention to either of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. And he has been in the Senate four years.

Mr. PENROSE. He has been in the Senate four years; and there is no Member of this body—and I cite the records of the Senate as my proof—who has a larger record for absenteeism than himself. It ill becomes him to criticise other Senators or any committee for negligence, inattention, or absenteeism.

I further make the statement that when he is here it is but to delay the business of the Senate, to hold up the transaction of the public business, and to embarrass those who, under their oath of office and in the conscientious discharge of their duties, are endeavoring to carry the burdens of the senatorial office. These sentiments I believe my colleagues will voice, and I shall not sit here—and I desire to give notice to the Senator from Wisconsin—and listen to arguments that better become the vendor of a patent medicine from the tail end of a cart in a remote village in Wisconsin than they do the deliberation and the dignity of the Senate of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair must admonish occupants of the galleries that applause is not permitted under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President. I ask that Rule XIX be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read Rule XIX at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XIX.

DEBATE.

1. When a Senator desires to speak, he shall rise and address the Presiding Officer, and shall not proceed until he is recognized, and the Presiding Officer shall recognize the Senator who shall first address him. No Senator shall interrupt another Senator in debate without his consent, and to obtain such consent he shall first address the Presiding Officer; and no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not propose to invoke this rule, but I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who has spoken three or four times on one question, when the rules only permit him the privilege of speaking twice, ought not to delay the Senate unduly. I shall not ask that the rule be enforced now, but I simply wished to call it to the attention of the Senate; that was all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not ask for any indulgence from the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GAL-

LINGER], or any other Senator here, with respect to the rules. I purpose to observe the rules of this body in debate. They have been enforced sometimes with undue strictness, I have thought, with reference to myself. I have had them applied to me when debate has been permitted to run on here, and Senators took the floor as many times as they pleased upon a single amendment. I can very easily delay the brief reply which I wish to make to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] until another amendment is pending before this body and keep entirely within the rules; but what I have to say will compass but a moment of time, and I will say it now, unless I am called to order.

It is of little value, I presume, to utter a contradiction here to much that has been said. It puts the word of one Senator against that of another. I have not attended the meetings of some of the committees to which I was assigned. I attended the meetings of the Committee on Claims once or twice. It was not a committee upon which I felt I could render any service, and I asked the Senate to relieve me from further service upon it. The Committee on the Census, in the early part of this session, had legislation under consideration, and that is the only legislation that I have been informed has been before that committee since I have been a member of it. I was absent at my home in Wisconsin immediately following the holiday recess for about one week, and during that time the bill was under consideration and was reported.

I think I have been reasonably diligent in my attendance upon the Committee on Indian Affairs. I do not believe that the Senator has the warrant and authority of my associates and colleagues upon that committee for any such statement as he has made.

Mr. PENROSE. The unanimous testimony of the members of that committee is that of nonattendance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would have more confidence, I would say, in that statement if Senators who are members of that committee made the declaration themselves.

I was absent from the sessions of this Senate for two months last session, confined to my home in this city by a severe illness. During that time the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. ELKINS], in discussing legislation here, referred to my absence as a political mission in Wisconsin. It was very unjust.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can cite the Senator to the statement. I yield.

Mr. ELKINS. I have no remembrance of it whatever.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will tell the Senator what bill was under consideration here at the time. It was the railroad coemployee bill. I will bring to the Senator's attention the exact language that he used.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish the Senator would, and I ask him now to do so, because I have no remembrance of it whatever, and I think the Senator is mistaken. Whatever was said is in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is in the RECORD, and I will bring it to the Senator's attention. I did not consider it, Mr. President, of importance enough to bring it up here until on this occasion. Except for the absences enforced by sickness since I have been a Member of this body, and such absence as was necessary in the preparation for discussion upon the floor of the Senate of important legislation, I have not been absent a day since I have been a Member of this body, excepting five days following the holiday adjournment of this present session. At that time I was at my home, superintending the publication of the magazine which I am issuing, and it seemed absolutely necessary that I should give a few days of attention to that business at that time. Other than that, I have been in attendance upon the sessions of the Senate since I have been a Member of it every day.

With reference to the character of my work when I am here, Mr. President, the RECORD speaks for that. The opinion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, with respect to that, counts for nothing with me. Against his coarse and vulgar assault I put my record since I have been a Member of this body.

Let me say to him and to other Senators here who do not agree with me with respect to matters of legislation, You can take no course which will deter me from exercising my rights upon this floor and expressing my views upon legislation and upon the orderly conduct of the business of this body. If you were better acquainted with me, you would know that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 3, after line 11, to insert:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem allowance, inspectors in charge, and the chief post-office inspector, and expenses incurred by inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 11, line 10, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nine" and insert "seven;" and in line 11, before the word "eight," to insert "fifty," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $31,758,500.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My attention was distracted for a moment. I ask on what page is the amendment which has just been read?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On page 11, line 10.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, this amendment was discussed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] a short time ago. I then stated that I had been directed by the committee to offer four or five amendments——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not find the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the amendment on page 11, line 10.

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I have the floor. I have not yielded the floor to the Senator from Wisconsin for the purpose of making an inquiry.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know whether or not the Senator has the floor. I was in my seat and addressed the Chair, and was recognized by him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will be in order. The Senator from Wisconsin rose to make a proper inquiry.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no doubt——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the Senator from Wisconsin. The amendment is in line 10, page 11. The Senator from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not understand, Mr. President, that I had yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin for the purpose of making an inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. As I have heretofore explained, I now offer by direction of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads several amendments to the phraseology of the following paragraphs to correspond with the reduction of the total amount.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania on behalf of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, at the end of line 23, after the word "stations," it is proposed to strike out "eighty-four," and insert "sixty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 9, after the word "stations," it is proposed to strike out "one hundred and thirteen" and insert "one hundred and eighteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 14, after the word "stations," it is proposed to strike out "six thousand nine hundred and sixty-one" and insert "five thousand six hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 19, after the word "stations," it is proposed to strike out "seven thousand eight hundred and fifteen" and insert "eight thousand three hundred and fifteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 24, after the word "matter," it is proposed to strike out "six thousand" and insert "seven thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. The amendment of the committee on page 11, line 10, was stated by the Secretary, but has not yet been acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 13, line 18, before the word "thousand," to insert "and seventy-five," so as to read:

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post-offices, $3,975,000, of which sum not to exceed $50,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 6, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifteen," so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to post-offices of the first and second class, $315,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 20, after the word "service," to insert "and for the pay of letter carriers in second-class post-offices eligible for promotion to the fifth grade, $155,000;" in line 22, before the word "twenty-nine," to insert "In all;" in line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" and in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty-eight" and insert "twenty-three," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for carriers absent without pay, city delivery service, and for the pay of letter carriers in second-class post-offices eligible for promotion to the fifth grade, $155,000. In all, $29,623,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and twenty," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers, substitute and auxiliary letter carriers at new offices entitled to city delivery service, $100,000, of which sum $20,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General," on page 16, line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one million" and insert "nine hundred thousand;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out "and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts not exceeding, in the aggregate, $1,388,759, under the provisions of the law, for a period not exceeding ten years," so as to make the clause read:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $900,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and sixty-eight," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $46,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 6, to insert:

That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust annually the compensation to be paid for the transportation of mails on railroad routes from and after the 1st day of July, 1910, upon the conditions and at the rates provided by law, the average daily weight to be ascertained, in every case, by the actual simultaneous weighing of the mails for thirty-five successive days, commencing on such date as the Postmaster-General may designate each year, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct, and the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average daily weight. In connection with such weighing and readjustment, where there are two or more routes by which the mails may be dispatched between important points with equal facility and advantage to the mail service, the Postmaster-General may send such mails by either route, provided the allowance for the carriage of the same by the longer route or more expensive route shall not exceed the cost of the carriage of an equal weight of mail between the same points by the shorter or less expensive route; and the Postmaster-General shall give the company carrying such mails advance notice of his intention to take their weights separately from the other mails of the route, and readjust the compensation for the carriage of the same on the basis of their value on the shorter or less expensive route, and shall report weekly during the time of such weighing the weights of such mails to the company carrying them.

And out of the appropriation for inland mail transportation the Postmaster-General is authorized hereafter to pay rental in Washington, D. C., and compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings for assistance in completing computations, in connection with the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes as provided by law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, is this the amendment on page 18?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the amendment on pages 18 and 19.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill, approximately, what additional cost that will impose upon the Post-Office Department annually?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I would say for this amendment that it is the same amendment, I believe, in identical phraseology——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will wait one moment until I lead up to his question—which passed the Senate at its last session without any opposition. It is strongly recommended by the Postmaster-General, and when the matter comes up for debate, if it does, I shall have his letter read.

At the last session of Congress the amendment went out in the House, and I have no idea that the House will concur in it this year. Rather than have any prolonged debate I would be willing to sacrifice the paragraph; and, in any event, if it is going to lead to any prolonged debate now, I would suggest that we pass this item over and finish the remainder of the bill.

As to the exact increase that this will cause the department, I believe the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has looked a little more carefully into the matter than I have, and I would ask him to explain it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the mail is now being weighed in one-fourth of the country every year. As the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] knows, the country is divided into four districts, and all the mail in each district is weighed once in four years. The purpose of the department in making the recommendation is to secure uniform weighing throughout the country simultaneously. A slight computation will show that the weighing every four years in a given district is conducted for one hundred and five days consecutively. This amendment proposes to have weighing done throughout the whole country for a period of thirty-five days each year.

The exact difference in cost between weighing each year for thirty-five days or once in four years for one hundred and five days is somewhat difficult to compute. The opinion of the department, as expressed by the officers whom I have consulted, is that there will be no considerable increase of expense, although there probably will be some increase in computations at Washington. I believe that is the view the department has expressed on the subject.

The letter of the Postmaster-General on this phase of the questions contains a statement which I will read, from page 159 of the print of the appropriation bill of last year, which is available at the room of the committee, and I think in the document room. After certain computations the statement runs as follows:

From the above it appears that the probable expense of a one hundred and five days' weighing (that is, ninety working days, as provided for by present law) would be $1,388,461.78. This covers the expense of weighing the mails throughout the entire country, and covers a period of four years. It also appears that the cost of a thirty-five days' weighing for the entire country would be approximately $462,820.59, but for one year's weighing only. The cost, therefore, of the weighings for four years upon this basis would be four times this amount, or $1,851,282.36. Therefore the difference between these aggregates would be $462,820.58, and represents the increased cost for a period of four years if annual weighings upon the thirty-five days' basis were inaugurated, or an average increase per anum of $115,705.14.

That is a computation which is only approximate, but is probably pretty liberal in allowance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was not able to hear plainly enough to determine just what the $115,000 refers to. I caught the figures, but lost the rest of it.

Mr. CARTER. The annual increase would be, according to the statement of the Postmaster-General——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, the increase in expense?

Mr. CARTER. In the expense of weighing annually instead of quadrennially.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. For thirty-five days annually instead of one hundred and five days every four years, it would make an additional expense of $115,705.14 per annum.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, at what time in the year the mails would be weighed under the proposed amendment, if he has the information?

Mr. CARTER. That has been thoroughly considered at different times. First, it was proposed to fix the date upon which the weighing should commence, but it was suggested, and, I think, very aptly, too, that this would warn the railroads of the time when the weighing was to occur and perchance aid in padding the weights at that time. In order to guard against such a contingency the Postmaster-General is given authority to fix the date at which the weighing shall begin, and, it is assumed, would fix a date covering a period following, which would give a fair average for the year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to propound another inquiry to the Senator from Montana, who seems to be informed about this amendment. What probable increase will this reweighing of the mails make in the amounts that the railroads will receive from the Government for carrying the mail?

Mr. CARTER. That, of course, depends upon the growth of the country. I believe the average increase in four years, for a period of many years past, has been about 28 per cent in the weight of the mail, or 7 per cent per year. I think the increase is somewhat less than 28 per cent, and the annual increase, therefore, between 6 and 7 per cent. Seven per cent may be a round statement, or 6 per cent may be. The mail increases in volume more rapidly some years than other years, but there has not been a decrease, so far as I am advised, during any year over a preceding year.

According to the figures stated, the increase of weight each year would be between 6 and 7 per cent of the aggregate weight of the preceding year. The amount of expense I have not computed, and it could not be computed without taking into consideration the fact that the adjustment occurs every four years. This would subdivide it. Probably the average weight of the mail for the period of four years would be about one-half the increase during the four years, or, say, not to exceed 14 per cent—7 per cent per year. The exact amount in dollars and cents can not well be computed, because we are not advised as to what the weights will be. The Senator can make a computation, I presume, upon the theory that there will be 6 to 7 per cent increase annually.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not been able since the bill came up for consideration to get any data from which I could make that computation. A member of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads sent me a statement referring to this very amendment, from which I read the following:

This amendment will mean an increase of cost in the transportation of the mails of $2,500,000 to $3,000,000.

That is, it will increase the pay of the railroad companies for transporting the mails to that amount.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that at the time the last appropriation bill was passed, two years ago, there was an effort to incorporate into the bill an amendment with respect to the divisor employed by the Post-Office Department in computing mail weights for a week's weighing, as I remember now—I am stating it from recollection—it having been the practice of the Post-Office Department to weigh the mails for a certain number of days and then compute the average by using as a divisor, not the number of days on which the mails had been actually weighed, but by using a smaller divisor, resulting in a false average and in paying the railroads for carrying the mails several million dollars a year more than they were justly entitled to receive. I recall that an amendment to correct this evil practice was placed upon the post-office appropriation bill in the Senate, and that it was dropped from the bill in conference.

I am informed that the Post-Office Department, recognizing the justice of the purpose of that amendment and the wrongfulness of the established practice in the department, made new rules for weighing the mails and corrected the wrong.

The result of that action has been a reduction in the compensation which the railroads receive, as the railroads now claim, of three or four million dollars.

This proposed new system of weighing, according to the information which has been submitted to me and which I just read, stating my authority, will give the railroads more than half as much extra pay as they have lost by reason of the correction of the average weights of mail matter carried.

No one will contend that the railroad companies ought to carry the mail for less than is reasonable. This proposition to weigh the mail once a year instead of once in four years, upon its face, looks reasonable. If the companies received no more than a reasonable sum for their service, it is not just that the weights should be fixed at a given period, and they be required through four years from that period to carry the mail at that weight, while there is a constant increase in the weight each year throughout the four-year period. But, Mr. President, I am confident that the railway companies are grossly overpaid for their services in transporting the mails, and that, equitably, they have not in fact any claim to make for an increase in pay because of any possible increase in weight, however fair it may appear upon its face.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania excused his opposition to the increase in pay for employees in the Railway Mail Service on the ground that it is necessary to protect the Treasury against the draught which would have resulted from the adoption of that amendment. If he had applied the same rule and been as considerate in protecting the Treasury against the large increase which this amendment will certainly make in favor of the railroads, he would not have reported it for concurrence, because it can only result in making a tax of some two or three million dollars upon the Treasury.

Mr. President, in view of that fact, I make the point of order that this amendment is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Before a ruling is made, I should like to correct a statement——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I withhold the point of order.

Mr. PENROSE. Made with a looseness that is not unusual with the Senator from Wisconsin, that two or three million dollars are involved in this amendment. From the best investigation which I can make I find that it is a matter of about $100,000 additional cost, with perhaps a saving to the Government by the adoption of the paragraph. But, as I told the Senator in the beginning, I do not care whether the amendment remains in the bill or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before I raise the point of order again I will say that the Senator from Pennsylvania evidently heard only a part of what I said on the subject. I understand perfectly well that the extra cost of weighing the mail once a year is something over $100,000. I was able, in the rush this morning, to get that information over the telephone from the Postmaster-General. That was as near as he could estimate it.

But in addition this amendment will impose upon the Treasury a tax of some two or three million dollars in the form of additional pay to the railroads; and I am informed by the same authority upon which I make this statement—a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House—that there has been a large railway lobby here asking the enactment of this proposition. I do not know whether they constitute the people referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania this morning when he said that there were gentlemen waiting who were anxious to have the bill disposed of.

Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withhold the point of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I withhold it for a moment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in order that the persuasive reasons advanced by the Postmaster-General—presented to the committee in the form of letters last year on the amendment then adopted, which was identical with the one now under consideration—may appear, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the letters of the Postmaster-General relating to this question. They are instructive and set forth the reasons that impelled the committee to place the amendment in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letters referred to are as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman of Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the request to be advised with reference to the bill S. 6157, introduced by Senator CARTER on March 16, 1908, "To provide for a uniform and simultaneous weighing of the mails on railroad routes, and an equitable adjustment of the compensation for the carriage of such mails," I have to state as follows:

The bill is identical, with one exception, with the revision made by the department of a draft of a provision submitted by the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and with the changes hereinafter suggested meets with the approval of the department, provided the Congress sees fit to thereby increase the expenditures for transportation of the mails by railroad routes. The compensation for carrying the mails on each route is now adjusted upon a quadrennial weighing. Such adjustment continues without change in the rate of pay for the succeeding four years. Inasmuch as the country is growing rapidly and the weights of mails are therefore proportionately increasing, it is often insisted by railroad companies that if the rate of compensation is no more than adequate at the time of the weighing (and they claim that it is not) it becomes inadequate for the increased service performed before the net quadrennial weighing. An annual weighing would give a readjustment upon the annual increase of the weights of mails and would appear to be equitable and fair. It should, however, be borne in mind that such a provision would increase the gross amount paid for such transportation of the mails and would also add to the annual expense incident to the weighing of the mails. Under the present practice the routes are weighed once in every four years.

The increase in the weight of mails occurring during a four-year period is not represented by increase in rate of compensation until the adjustment for the succeeding term, which adjustment continues for the next succeeding four years. Under the provisions of this bill the adjustment would continue for only one year and the companies would receive the increased compensation each succeeding year for the increase in weight for each preceding year.

A careful estimate has been made as to the probable increase in the expense for the weighing of the mails—that is, for weighers, tabulators, etc. The following table will show the actual cost for the last four weighings by sections, the estimated cost for each of said sections for thirty-five days based upon the actual cost for the weighing period, and the estimated cost by sections for one hundred and five days based upon the same rate:

Weighings.	Number of days.	Actual cost paid weighers, etc.	Estimated cost if weighing had lasted only 35 days.	Estimated cost if weighing had continued for 105 days.
Second section, 1904	84	$108,521.79	$45,217.55	$135,652.65
First section, 1904	70	280,817.17	122,094.42	366,283.26
First section, 1905	91
Fourth section, 1906	105	296,726.66	98,908.89	296,726.66
Third section, 1907	105	589,799.21	196,599.73	589,799.21
Total			462,820.59	1,388,461.78

From the above it appears that the probable expense of a one hundred and five days' weighing—that is, ninety working days, as provided for by present law—would be $1,388,461.78. This covers the expense of weighing the mails throughout the entire country, and covers a period of four years. It also appears that the cost of a thirty-five days' weighing for the entire country would be approximately $462,820.59, but for one year's weighing only. The cost, therefore, of the weighings for four years upon this basis would be four times this amount, or $1,851,282.36. Therefore the difference between these aggregates would be $462,820.58, and represents the increased cost for a period of four years if annual weighings upon the thirty-five days' basis were inaugurated, or an average increase per annum of $115,705.14.

As to the specific provisions of the bill, I have the following to say:

In lines 9 and 10 provision is made for commencing the weighing the first Monday in March each year. It is believed in the Department that such a provision would be inadvisable. It has been customary to weigh the mails in the New England section, for instance, in the fall of the year, for the reason that it is believed to furnish a better average than a weighing at any other season. There are a few exceptional cases also, such as summer routes, where it becomes necessary to weigh at a different season than that during which other routes are weighed. Moreover, where the period is absolutely fixed by law there would be no discretion left in the Postmaster-General to extend a weighing to meet unusual and extraordinary emergencies that might arise in special localities. In lieu of this provision I would suggest the words, following the word "days," in line 9, "at such time, each year."

The bill further provides for the use of the whole number of days included in the weighing period as a divisor for obtaining the average daily weight. This will give legislative expression to the present practice of the department, based upon my order No. 412, of June 7, 1907.

The bill further provides for an equalization of cost of transportation where there are two or more routes by which the mails may be dispatched between important points with equal facility and advantage to the mail service. This will give legislative expression to the practice of the department recently adopted.

The immediate administrative difficulty in administering such a law will be in the completion of the adjustments with the present limited force of the Division of Railway Adjustments. It is apparent that so far as computations for adjustments and the work consequent thereto are concerned there will be four times the amount of work that is now required. It will be impossible for the present force to complete that work within the time necessary to make proper payments to the railroad companies. It is believed, however, that this difficulty can be overcome until adequate provision is made in the legislative bill for additional force if provision is made which will permit not only the tabulation to be done at Washington, but the employment of tabulators in assisting upon the computations and adjustments. In order to clearly provide for this work, it is suggested that the last paragraph of the proposed bill be modified by the insertion of the words "and compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings for assistance in completing computations" after the word "Columbia," in line 21.

The provision, as changed by these suggestions, would read as follows:

"That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to readjust annually the compensation to be paid for the transportation of the mails on railroad routes from and after the 1st day of July, 1909, upon the conditions and at the rates provided by law, the average daily weight to be ascertained in every case by the actual weighing of the mails for thirty-five successive days, at such times each year after June 30, 1908, and the result to be stated and verified in such form and manner as the Postmaster-General may direct; and the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as a divisor for obtaining the average daily weight. In connection with such weighing and readjustment, where there are two or more routes by which the mails may be dispatched between important points with equal facility and advantage to the mail service, the Postmaster-General may send such mails by either route, provided the allowance for the carriage of the same by the longer or more expensive route shall not exceed the cost of the carriage of an equal weight of mail between the same points by the shorter or less expensive route. And the Postmaster-General shall give the company carrying such mails advance notice of his intention to take their weights separately from the other mails of the route and readjust the compensation for the carriage of the same on the basis of their value on the shorter or less expensive route, and shall report weekly during the time of such weighing the weights of such mails to the company carrying them.

"And out of the appropriation for inland mail transportation the Postmaster-General is authorized hereafter to pay rental in Washington, D. C., and compensation to tabulators and clerks employed in connection with the weighings for assistance in completing computations, in connection with the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes as provided by law."

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman of Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring further to the request to be advised in regard to bill S. 6157, introduced by Senator CARTER on March 16, 1908, "To provide for a uniform and simultaneous weighing of the mails on railroad routes, and an equitable adjustment of the compensation for the carriage of such mails," and to my letter of the 23d instant, I wish to call more specific attention to the practice of the department in regard to the equalization of cost of transportation where there are two or more routes by which the mails may be dispatched between important points with equal facility and advantage to the service, which the bill provides for as a matter of legislation, among others.

In my annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, on page 24 attention was called to this new feature of economy in readjustments, and I said as follows:

"The elements of expedition, efficiency, and economy are given consideration in arranging for the transportation of mails on railroads. Where through mails are concerned, the department often has the choice of competing routes. A competing route may be shorter than another, it may be more economical by reason of being a land-grant route, or it may perform important terminal or transfer functions which must otherwise be provided for by the department. After the transportation of the mails has been established over a route and the train schedules remain satisfactory it is not advisable to divert mails merely because a competing route offers to make a satisfactory schedule. The facts that the transportation has been established over such route, that the company has furnished the necessary facilities for their carriage, and that railway postal clerks have been assigned to duty with reference to such mail routing are given due consideration, and if the company carrying the mails can furnish as advantageous service as the competing company it is not advisable to take the mails away from it. Where the department has the opportunity of dispatching mails by competing routes, one of which is shorter or otherwise less expensive than the other, it appears to be but just to the Government, when such mails are allowed to remain with the longer or more expensive route, to reduce the compensation paid therefor by the amount which the Government would save if the mails in question were dispatched by the shorter or less expensive route.

"Accordingly the policy has been inaugurated of effecting such a saving in cases of this character arising at the beginning of a contract term, and has been applied in some prominent instances in the readjustments in the third contract section."

While it is impracticable at present to give an accurate statement of the amount of saving to the Government which will result for one contract term even upon the application of this principle to the whole service, it may nevertheless be asserted with entire assurance that the economy will be very considerable. This will be apparent when it is remembered that there is a movement of large volumes of through mails between large commercial and postal centers of the country, as, for instance, between New York and Chicago, New York and Washington, Washington and Jacksonville, Chicago and St. Louis, St. Louis and Kansas City, Chicago and Union Pacific Transfer, Iowa, and the Middle West centers and the Southwest and West. Specific figures can not be given, however, until weighings are had, the mails concerned segregated, and the weights ascertained and their values determined. The importance of such economy is indicated, however, by the facts in one case in the third contract section, where the department secured the benefit of an equalization of the cost of transporting through mails between Chicago, Ill., and Union Pacific Transfer, Iowa. That computation has been completed and indicates the probable saving of approximately $20,000 a year. This is but one case, and it is believed that the department's efforts in this direction will result in a large annual saving to the Government. While it is the purpose of the department to continue this practice, the desirability of a specific direction by Congress to the same effect is recognized.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to the request of Senator CARTER that the committee be furnished with a statement of the increase in weights of mails carried by railroads over the entire country for the past four years, I have the honor to submit the following:

It is impracticable to furnish a statement of the increase in the average daily weights for the entire country for any one period of four years, inasmuch as the country is divided into four weighing sections and the weighing of these succeed each other annually, thus making a weighing in any one section occur once only in four years, but not simultaneous with weighings in other sections. The increase in average daily weights at these several weighings will practically represent, however, the increase in the average daily weights for the entire country, providing the weighings were held simultaneously. The following statement will show these increases:

Section 1, weighed 1901, adjusted from July 1, 1901, to June 30, 1905: Increase in average daily weight shown by this weighing 908,436 pounds, or 28.66 per cent.

Section 2, weighed in 1900, adjusted from July 1, 1900, to June 30, 1904: Increase in average daily weight shown by this weighing 219,898 pounds, or 24.27 per cent.

Section 3, weighed in 1903, adjusted from July 1, 1903, to June 30, 1907: Increase in average daily weight shown by this weighing, 559,798 pounds, or 11.97 per cent.

Section 4, weighed in 1902, adjusted from July 1, 1902, to June 30, 1906: Increase in average daily weight shown by this weighing, 1,089,355 pounds, or 69.02 per cent.

Total increase in average daily weights for all sections, 2,777,487 pounds, or 26.89 per cent.

This represents approximately the increase in the average daily weight of the mails for a period of four years.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman of Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your attention is respectfully invited to the recommendation made in my report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, upon pages 23 and 24, as follows:

"The act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L., 341), authorizes the payment of the expenses of weighing the mails from the appropriations for railroad transportation. The weighing is done in cars and at railroad stations by employees of the department. The results are tabulated in the offices of the superintendents of railway mail service at division headquarters and are then certified to the department, where the average daily weights are computed. For the purpose of securing the greatest economy and uniformity of method it is desirable to have the tabulations made in the department. I therefore recommend that Congress authorize the renting of suitable quarters in Washington to accommodate the special force of tabulators employed upon this work."

I therefore have the honor to recommend to your favorable consideration the enactment into law of the following provision, namely:

"And out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes the Postmaster-General is authorized hereafter to pay rental in Washington, D. C., in connection with the expenses of taking the weights of mails on railroad routes as provided by law."

This provision might properly be placed under the paragraph relating to inland transportation by railroad routes, following line 20, page 18, of the postal bill, H. R. 18347, as referred to your committee.

In further explanation of this recommendation, I have the honor to submit the following:

The country is divided into four contract sections, and the mails are weighed, as provided for by law, not less frequently than once every four years. These weighings are ordered by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, through the division of railway adjustments, and are conducted by the Railway Mail Service. Weighers are employed from available substitute railway postal clerks and others who are employed temporarily during the period. Besides those who actually weigh the mails, there are employed a certain number called "tabulators," who receive the weight cards from the clerks who weigh the mails, adjust all irregularities, and tabulate the weights that are so received daily by trains upon one sheet for each route, which, when completed, shows the total weights taken on and put off for the whole period of the weighing at each station upon the route. This weight circular is certified by the superintendent of the Railway Mail Service and is forwarded to the department, division of railway adjustments. This last-named division has charge of the adjustments of pay, and the clerks, under the direction of the superintendent of railway adjustments, compute the average daily weights for each route, using therefor the weight circular above mentioned.

It will be apparent that the work of tabulation is essentially a part of the computation of the average daily weight, and therefore of the Division of Railway Adjustments. If these tabulations were done at Washington, under the direction of the superintendent of that division, it would serve good administrative purposes. The force engaged upon the work could be better selected. They would work under one direction and according to a uniform method of procedure. Being employed at one place instead of two, three, or more, the incidental expenses would necessarily be less. Working under one direction and supervision, their services would be more efficient and more economically applied, and the number employed would consequently be less. One special feature about the matter should not be overlooked, even if there was no economy to be attained—that is, that these steps which are preliminary to the adjustment of railroad pay, a subject of such magnitude and importance, should be conducted with the greatest care in order that there may be no errors, mistakes, or wrong certifications. It is evident that this feature could be best accomplished by having these tabulations done at one point and under the direction of the division which makes and is responsible for the computations.

The expense of the weighings are paid out of the appropriation for the transportation of the mails in accordance with continuing authority of law. (Act of Mar. 3, 1875, ch. 128, 18 Stat. L., 341.) There is no additional authority of law required to have the work done and paid for by the employment of tabulators at Washington. The only difficulty in the way is that there is no office room in the department to provide for such additional clerks, and it would be necessary to rent quarters outside. It was for this purpose that the matter was brought to the attention of Congress, in order that authority might be secured to rent such quarters. The payment for the same could be made under the act above referred to. The reason that it is necessary to have additional legislation to authorize such rental is because by the act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. L., 370), it is provided that no contract shall be made for the rent of any building or part of any building to be used for the purposes of the Government in the District of Columbia until an appropriation therefor shall have been made in terms by Congress.

It will be seen, therefore, that this recommendation does not involve any additional expenditure excepting what would be incident to the specific authority to rent quarters in Washington for the tabulators. It is now necessary to rent rooms at some division headquarters for this work. It is believed that upon the whole economy of expenditure would be obtained as well as greater efficiency and better administration secured.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1908.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman of Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your attention is respectfully invited to the recommendation made in my report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, upon page 25, the purpose of which was to secure consideration of needed legislation to enable the department to readjust the rates of pay for railroad mail transportation in cases of the diversions of mails during a contract term. The reasons therefor are fully set forth on page 25 of my report and in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, on page 144 of the annual report for the Post-Office Department. I have set forth in my report upon the page referred to the specific language of a proposed provision of law, as follows:

"When, after a weighing of the mails for the purpose of readjusting the compensation for their transportation on a railroad route, mails are diverted therefrom, the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, ascertain the effect of such diversion by a weighing of the mails so diverted for such number of successive working days as he may determine and have the weights stated and verified to him as in other cases, and readjust the compensation upon the routes affected accordingly: Provided, That no readjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on either of the routes affected."

This has been prepared in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General by the officer who is charged with the duty of making adjustments and is believed to fully meet the requirements. It might properly be placed under the paragraph relating to inland transportation by railroad routes, following line 20, page 18, of the postal bill (H. R. 18347), as referred to your committee. I have the honor to recommend this to your favorable consideration.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana to state what those reasons are. The papers will be put in the RECORD, but I should like to know now for my own information what the reasons are.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the system of accounting in the Post-Office Department is very unsatisfactory. Some two years ago or more—indeed, three, I think—a joint committee of the two Houses was appointed to investigate the cost of carrying second-class mail matter through the mails. It had been alleged, and, I believe stated, repeatedly in the reports of the Postmasters-General, that it cost 7 cents per pound to carry second-class mail matter, whereas we were receiving only 1 cent per pound for the service. If the statement made in the Postmaster-General's report proved true, it followed, of course, that we were losing 6 cents on every pound of second-class matter carried through the mail.

The joint committee of the two Houses undertook to ascertain the correctness of the statement with reference to the 7 cents per pound. The accountants of the Post-Office Department were summoned, the Postmaster-General was brought forward, several of his assistants were examined, and we found that the Post-Office Department was utterly unable with its system or lack of system to tell anything about the cost of doing any part of the business being conducted. They alleged that one of the great difficulties in the way of stating what the second-class mail matter cost rested in the fact that the weighing over the country was not simultaneously done—that the division of the country into four districts rendered it impossible to tell, for instance, the average distance one of the monthly magazines was carried in the mail, the average distance a daily paper was carried in the mail, the average distance a weekly paper was carried in the mail, the average distance that any of the matter admitted as second-class matter was carried. That followed because the country was divided into sections, some small and some large, geographically. It was stated that if they could weigh simultaneously all over the country they could with almost unvarying certainty determine the distance parcels were carried, the amount originating at different points, and the destination of the average, and thus be able to inform the committee of the cost of doing this kind of business.

Later on, evidently impressed by the infirmity of the accounting system, being desirous of getting such data as would enable the department from time to time to make a statement of the cost, the Postmaster-General called for this annual weighing. The committee reduced the railroad pay, as I remember, about the time this recommendation was made to the amount of about $6,000,000 per annum—between $4,000,000 and $6,000,000—by reducing rates per mile and by a percentage reduction on the routes carrying lighter mail.

Following that reduction, for the purpose, as stated at the time, of getting accurate figures upon which the department could act, stating the cost, the annual weighing was recommended by the Postmaster-General and inserted in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If no other Senator desires to add anything to the discussion upon the paragraph, I raise the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That the amendment under consideration is general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to say that I recognize the force of the point of order, and, as I said at the beginning, I have no desire to press this amendment if it will lead to any debate or if any Senator objects to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the point of order is well taken, under paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, and therefore sustains the point of order. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rose to offer an amendment to a provision on page 20, but it just occurs to me that we are now considering only committee amendments, and that as the amendment is to the House text, it is not in order at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is in order now.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it will be in order later, after the Senate committee amendments shall have been disposed of, I will withhold it until then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it may be presented after the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, in the item for Railway Mail Service, on page 21, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "fifty-five," so as to make the clause read:

For substitutes for clerks on vacation, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, after line 4, to insert:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $23,000.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] offered an amendment to the amendment, which is pending.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a short letter from the Postmaster-General explaining the amendment as it has been put in the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1909.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

SIR: H. R. 26305, passed by the House of Representatives January 27, 1909, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, makes no provision for traveling expenses for the officials of the Railway Mail Service, the following paragraph having been dropped out of the bill:

"For actual and necessary expenses of division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $23,000."

I would respectfully recommend that this paragraph be inserted after line 24, on page 19, of the bill as introduced in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER, Postmaster-General.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendment just read is subject to the point of order, which will be made. I do not know whether or not the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] desires to be in the Senate when it is made.

Mr. BAILEY. Pass over the paragraph.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have sent the secretary of the Senator from Nebraska to the committee room. I will ask that it be passed over for the moment. The Senator will be on the floor within a few moments.

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest that it be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be passed over, in the absence of objection.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster," on page 25, line 24, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty," so as to make the clause read:

For stationery, including all money-order offices, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Postmaster-General explaining the reasons for the increase.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C. February 2, 1909.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the post-office appropriation bill, reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives (H. R. 26305), several of the appropriations under the control of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General have been reduced.

The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, as recommended by this office, are exactly the same as the appropriation granted for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Earnest protest is made against the decrease in the amounts asked for in two appropriations, namely, for "stationery, including all money-order offices," and for "supplies for the city-delivery service, including letter boxes, letter-box fasteners, package boxes, posts, furniture, satchels, straps, baskets, time cards, time-card frames, time-recorder supplies, maps, transfer designs, and stencils."

The department's estimate for stationery was $150,000; this bill reduces the amount to $100,000.

On January 31, 1909, $109,777.97 had been expended from this appropriation, leaving a balance of $40,222.03, which balance will undoubtedly be expended before June 30, 1909.

In order to maintain the present high standard of efficiency covering the distribution of supplies, this appropriation should be at least as great as is provided for in the current appropriation act.

This statement applies with equal force to the appropriation covering supplies for the city-delivery service.

On the 31st day of January, 1909, $51,351.62 had been expended from the total appropriation of $90,000, leaving a balance of $38,648.38, which it will undoubtedly be necessary to expend during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

Respectfully,

G. v. L. MEYER.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 26, line 16, before the word "thousand," to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so as to make the clause read:

For blanks, books, and printed matter of urgent or special character, including the preparation, publication, and free distribution by postmasters to the public of a pamphlet containing general postal information, intaglio seals, and other miscellaneous items of immediate necessity for the registry system, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short letter from the Acting Postmaster-General explaining the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be inserted in the RECORD, without reading, as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The letter is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 5, 1909.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It was recently decided to extend the use of lead-sealed registered sack jackets in the Railway Mail Service, as it is believed that the more general use of the lead seal will be in the interest of economy, and also promote expedition in the Railway Mail Service. These seals must be purchased out of the appropriation—

"For blanks, books, and printed matter of urgent or special character, including the preparation, publication, and free distribution by postmasters to the public of a pamphlet containing general postal information, intaglio seals, and other miscellaneous items of immediate necessity for the registry system, $5,000"— which is under the control of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

There remains of this appropriation a balance of but $310.95, and in order to put into effect as soon as possible the plan referred to an appropriation of $1,000 for the purpose has been asked for in the general deficiency bill.

To continue the plan during the next fiscal year will necessitate an estimated expenditure of $3,000, and it is therefore requested that the amount carried in the above appropriation in the post-office appropriation bill now before your committee be increased from $5,000 to $8,000.

Respectfully,

C. P. GRANDFIELD,
Acting Postmaster-General.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was, on page 28, after line 11, to insert the following provisos:

Provided further, That the Postmaster-General, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of establishing a local parcel-post system on the rural delivery routes throughout the United States, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to experiment, and report to Congress not later than January 1, 1910, the result of such experiment, by establishing a local parcel-post system in two counties in the United States for packages originating on the rural delivery routes in said two counties, for delivery by rural carriers to patrons thereof, at such rates and under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be taken as authorizing the acceptance or delivery at the special rates of postage so prescribed of any parcel offered by any person acting as agent or representative, upon commission or otherwise, for any person or company not resident on such rural delivery routes: And provided further, That only such parcels shall be received for delivery at the special rates of postage so prescribed as are offered by bona fide merchants or dealers whose regular places of business are on rural delivery routes covered by this act, in the ordinary and regular course of their business, and by residents on such routes in their individual capacity; and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out these provisions.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. President, I submit that that amendment is general legislation, and plainly obnoxious to subdivision 3 of Rule XVI.

Mr. PENROSE. A similar objection was sustained to this paragraph last year, and I do not suppose it has grown immune since then.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment is in contravention of the rule cited by the Senator from Texas. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 15, to insert:

That so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $300,000 for the special weighing of the mails, provided for by the act of March 2, 1907, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, as may be necessary, not exceeding $1,411.32, is hereby made immediately available for the payment of services rendered by temporary clerks and employees engaged upon the work at Washington, D. C., in lieu of leave of absence with pay earned and not received.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have inserted a letter from the Postmaster-General and accompanying statements in connection with this amendment, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1909.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908, provided for a special weighing of the mails and appropriated $300,000 to pay the expenses. This weighing was duly had and a report to the Postmaster-General made according to law and is printed as House Document No. 910, Sixtieth Congress, first session. By strict economy and efficient management the work was completed without the expenditure of the amount appropriated, there being $83,044.59 remaining unexpended.

In order to complete the work it was necessary during the latter part of the service to utilize the efforts of the special force of temporary clerks employed upon it to the greatest extent possible. Accordingly many of them worked overtime, for which no compensation could be paid, and relinquished such leave as was due them under the rules and practice of the department in order that all work connected with the undertaking might be completed in accordance with the plans of the department. It was the intention to grant such persons the leaves of absence to which they were entitled following June 30, 1908, but the Auditor for the Post-Office Department and the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that the appropriation lapsed after that date, and that this understanding had with the employees was not such a contract as would permit the payment of any part of the appropriation therefor subsequent to that time. The result was that by reason of the special industry and consideration shown by these clerks in the prosecution of the work as desired by the department, they lost their leave and pay for the same. The services of all employees remaining were discontinued on June 30, 1908.

I hand you herewith a memorandum giving the names and the amount due each one of the clerks who were so employed. The aggregate is $1,411.32, and I have the honor to recommend that a paragraph be included in the appropriation bill for the Post-Office Department authorizing the payment of these amounts. The following phraseology is suggested:

"That so much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $300,000 for the special weighing of the mails provided for by the act of March 2, 1907, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, as may be necessary, not exceeding $1,411.32, is hereby made available for the payment of services rendered by temporary clerks and employees engaged upon the work at Washington, D. C., in lieu of leave of absence with pay earned and not received."

Faithfully, yours,

G. v. L. MEYER.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 15, 1909.

Hon. W. R. ANDREWS,
Clerk Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR COLONEL: Referring to our conversation over the phone in regard to the proposed paragraph allowing pay to the temporary clerks engaged on the special weighing for their services rendered in lieu of leave earned and not received, I inclose herewith a copy of the paragraph submitted, with the slight change, which you will observe, of the insertion of the word "immediately" before the word "available." This will enable us to pay these clerks upon the passage of the bill; otherwise they will have to wait until after July 1.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH STEWART,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

So much of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $300,000 for the special weighing of the mails provided for by the act of March 2, 1907, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1908, and for other purposes, as may be necessary, not exceeding $1,411.32, is hereby made immediately available for the payment of services rendered by temporary clerks and employees engaged upon the work at Washington, D. C., in lieu of leave of absence with pay earned and not received.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 2, to insert:

That section 3834 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking therefrom the following words: "and where an office is designated as a money-order office, the bond of the postmaster shall contain an additional condition for the faithful performance of all duties and obligations in connection with the money-order business."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 8, to insert:

That to provide officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps with facilities for the remittance of sums of money, pay officers of the navy are authorized to issue postal orders payable at any designated money-order office in the United States, the Philippine Islands, and the Canal Zone, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Navy may jointly prescribe: Provided, That the regular bonds of pay officers of the navy shall cover the faithful performance of this duty, and no additional bond shall be required therefor, and that all moneys received for such orders by pay officers shall be accounted for in their regular returns: And provided further, That no additional compensation shall be given to pay officers of the navy for the performance of this duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, after line 15, to strike out:

For per diem allowance of inspectors in the field while actually traveling on official business away from their home, their official domicile, and their headquarters, at a rate to be fixed by the Postmaster-General, not to exceed $4 per day, $325,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, allow inspectors per diem while temporarily located at any place on business away from their home, or their designated domicile, for a period not exceeding twenty consecutive days at any one place, and make rules and regulations governing the foregoing provisions relating to per diem: And provided further, That no per diem shall be paid to inspectors receiving annual salaries of $2,000 or more.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 2, to strike out:

For traveling expenses of inspectors without per diem allowance, inspectors in charge, and the chief post-office inspector, and expenses incurred by inspectors not covered by per diem allowance, $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment, on page 22, which was passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has just sent word that he has found it impossible to leave the room of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and he asked to have presented for him the amendment, which I think he left with the clerk, in lieu of the paragraph proposed by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was offered by unanimous consent and regarded as pending. It is the pending amendment. The Secretary will read, for the information of the Senate, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. In place of the committee amendment, on page 2, lines 5 to 10, inclusive, it is proposed to insert:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $2,000,000: Provided, That from and after July 1, 1909, railway postal clerks shall be paid their actual and necessary traveling expenses, not to exceed $1 per day, while away from the terminal where their runs or series of runs begin and end, when actually on duty, such expenses to be paid under the direction of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. ALDRICH. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. ALDRICH. That it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, and sustains the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 22. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after line 4, the committee report to insert:

For actual and necessary expenses, division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $23,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer an amendment, to follow the word "dollars," in line 7, on page 20.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes an amendment, which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 7, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall make an investigation and report to Congress at its next session the cost of building and maintaining post-office cars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is possible that a point of order will be made against the amendment, but before it is made I wish to submit some reasons for offering it.

It is proposed in the bill, as it now stands, to pay to the railroad companies of this country for the rental of railway mail cars used in the service $4,800,000. This large amount is to be paid to the railroad companies for the use of the post-office cars in which the mail is carried and is additional to the $46,000,000 paid for carrying the mails.

In the brief time I have had to-day I have not been able to investigate the reports of the different Postmasters-General with reference to this particular proposition, but I remember that while I was a Member of the House in 1887 Postmaster-General Vilas made a recommendation in his annual report of that year. I have it before me, and I will read briefly from it for the information of the Senate.

This bill, carrying as it does $4,800,000 for car rental, makes an allowance to the railroad companies of the country for the mere use of these cars $4,229 per car, on the average. I do not know that any observations of mine or any authorities that I might offer here are needed to emphasize the fact that that is an extravagant rental for the use of those cars.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, unless the Senator cares to go on with his remarks, I wish to say that I am going to make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do care to go on with my remarks for a little time, as I stated when I rose.

Mr. KEAN. I will certainly withhold it, then.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Postmaster-General Vilas, in his report in 1887, had this to say upon the subject of the rental of cars at that time, and I read only briefly from his report:

It is within bounds to affirm that all these cars—

That is, the railway mail cars—

might be to-day purchased or their duplicates manufactured for $1,600,000; add for cleaning, etc., as above—

That is, the care of the cars and keeping them in order for use. I ought to have said that this compensation is not only for rental, but requires the railroad companies to keep the cars in use in order—that is, cleaned and repaired. But Postmaster-General Vilas took all that into account in the recommendation he made which followed the portion of his report from which I am now reading:

It is within bounds to affirm that all these might be to-day purchased, or their duplicates manufactured, for $1,600,000; add for cleaning, etc., as above, at $720 per year each for 342 in use, $246,240, the total is reached of but $1,846,240. Yet simply for the use of these cars for the last year, including cleaning, etc., the department was under the annual rate of charge by the existing system of $1,881,580; and the estimate deemed necessary to submit in prudent provision for the coming fiscal year, on the same basis, is $2,000,000.

Reference to special instances in the annexed table of the longer lines discovers greater disparity than the average. In illustration, $59,037.75 is annually paid on one line for the use of 4 cars that might be built and fully equipped in the best modern style for less than $17,500. And this in addition to the full-weight pay for transportation, amounting in the case mentioned to $504,573.69.

Instead, then, of appropriating $2,000,000 to rent the use of these cars for the coming year, why should not the appropriation be of a smaller sum to buy them, and of another—say $250,000—for their keeping, the two together not aggregating the proposed rent? The department will thereafter gain at least $1,500,000 per year while sustaining the cost of casualties.

Mr. President, conditions have changed somewhat since that time. The cost of manufacturing cars has increased somewhat, I have no doubt, but, all that considered, it seems to me an unjustifiable extravagance to pay an annual rental for these railway mail cars almost sufficient to enable the Government to build and own the cars. These cars are railway post-offices. They are post-offices like the local post-offices, except that they are movable. The Government appropriates large sums of money to erect post-office buildings all over this country, and it is simply logically carrying out the plan of the Government owning its own post-office buildings. Here it can be done at an enormous saving to the taxpayers of the country.

If the committees of Congress are anxious to reduce this growing deficiency of the Post-Office Department, here, I submit, is a pretty good place to begin.

Mr. President, in view of the changed conditions since the time when this report was made, I have thought it best to offer the amendment in the form in which I submit it; that is, that the Postmaster-General be asked to make an investigation and report to the next Congress his conclusions with respect to this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEAN. I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposes general legislation, and is therefore in contravention of the rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to add at the end of the bill the following:

That on and after July 1, 1909, all rural carriers now serving daily routes of 24 miles or more shall receive as compensation for such service the sum of $1,200 per annum, payable in equal monthly installments; those serving daily routes of less than 24 miles shall receive as compensation such proportion of $1,200 as the miles of the routes served by them bears to 24 miles: Provided, That fractions of 1 mile shall not be considered in fixing such salary: And provided further, That no compensation shall be less than $600.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question or two before giving my reasons for the amendment. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what is the compensation of those delivering mail in the cities at the present time?

Mr. PENROSE. They are graded; the lowest grade being $600 and the highest $1,200.

Mr. McCUMBER. Thank you. I understand that they are graded according to length of service. They average perhaps——

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to correct the Senator in that statement. They are graded on an efficiency record, I understand, promotions being made according to efficiency.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. The probabilities are that to 90 per cent at least within a year or two there will be paid $1,200 per annum for each person engaged in city delivery. I notice that the rural-route delivery men receive all the way from $540 to $900 per annum, according to the length of their routes.

This amendment is intended to bring about as near as practicable a proper relation between the compensation paid one class of letter carriers and the compensation paid another class. I can see no good reason why the person delivering in a city, carrying a little sack with him—his only implement or vehicle, and that not even at his expense—should receive a greater compensation than the man who must drive in the country from 15 to 25 miles and must keep at least three horses and in most cases four, who must keep vehicles and must pay for provisions for those horses during that time.

It is safe to say that, considering the number of horses necessary for continuous work during the entire year, on an average four would not be too many. It is safe to say also, Mr. President, that those horses will depreciate in value, used on the road in all kinds of weather, under all conditions, about 20 per cent per year, and that the vehicles used will depreciate about the same amount per year. So the result is, when you get through, that the highest salary of the rural carrier is not more than about $700. I had an estimate before me some time ago from one of the letter carriers in the country to the effect that during the months of January, February, and March he paid more for horse feed than he got back in salary for the work during that particular period.

I appreciate the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania is attempting to hold this bill as low as possible, considering the state of the Treasury, but this Congress has been voting pretty large salaries, in very many instances far beyond that which I think just and right; and it seems to me that the proper place to raise a salary should be to the man who is not receiving a proper compensation rather than taking those who are receiving the highest possible compensation. If there is any cutting to be done, it should be done in other lines than in the matter of the salaries of those who perform the great service in carrying the mails through the country in all times of the year and under all conditions of climatic changes.

If the Senator would visit some of the Western and Northwestern States during the months of January, February, and March, the periods in which we are likely to have blizzards, and understand and appreciate the courage it takes for a carrier to venture out under such conditions, and the necessary expenses that are connected with those trips which are not taken into consideration, he would agree with me that the rural carriers are grossly underpaid, and that we should do something to raise the price paid for the services of the rural carriers so that their compensation may bear a just relation to that of other mail carriers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ALDRICH. I feel constrained to make the point of order that it is general legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand what the point of order is. The amendment simply provides for the payment of the salaries of certain classes. I can not understand that it is general legislation any more than the whole bill is general legislation.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is an additional item in the appropriation bill not estimated for and not recommended by a standing committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. It adds to an item in the bill, and it is not estimated for.

Mr. McCUMBER. You may make the point of order on that ground, but not on the ground of general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, and therefore sustains the point of order.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 26915) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, and I submit a report (No. 1035) thereon. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill at the earliest practicable moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if by that notice he means that the bill will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. I shall be glad to take it up to-morrow, but I expect to wait until the course of business to-morrow may be developed. The bill will be printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The bill will not be accessible to the members of the Senate until to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. Not until to-morrow morning.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I would now request the Senator to allow one day for the examination of the bill after it is printed before he takes it up.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I drew the attention of the Senate to the fact that I was reporting it to-night for the purpose of having Senators in the morning and during the early part of the day examine the bill and the report of the committee that accompanies it. I shall not undertake to crowd it early; but I want to get it up, if I can, some time during the day to-morrow and proceed as far as we may, or finish the bill, as the case may be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I inquire if the bill is accompanied by a report?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it a report which deals with the subject with some fullness?

Mr. WARREN. First, the report of the House committee will explain the bill as it was reported to the House; second, the report of the Senate committee will show every change made in the bill as it came from the House, giving the different items and the amount of increase or decrease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the reasons for the change?

Mr. WARREN. The reasons are not given in the report, but the reasons will be forthcoming from time to time from the estimates and from other papers, if they are asked for.
